Little Fred was out all day - sunburn

He knew no better—but it hurt just as bad. He fretted and whined till Ma applied Mentholatum

Next morning he was as good as new. He learned his lesson—and so did the family. They found out once more that Ma knows what to do—every time.

No more pain
Mentholatum is good for stings and bites of insects too—and for colds, burns, nervous headaches. Gentle, prompt, antiseptic.

Mentholatum is sold everywhere in 5c and 10c tins. The Manufacturing Co., Buffalo, N.Y., London, Eng.

JUST A GIRL
BY JANE PHELPS
A DISCOURAGING TIME
CHAPTER 85.

Things were going along beautifully. We had made a little more than our expenses from the very start, and now were earning more than either of us ever had, although we only took out $8 a week as our salary. This was due to a suggestion made by Mr. Pope, life had said:

In a partnership business it is always better to draw a regular salary. Then what is left can be applied to the extension of the business, or saved against the time it might be needed.

We had adopted his suggestion at once, and had every reason to be gratified. I was taking the same salary I had at the restaurant and the store. Mary was made getting quite as much as I had had myself, but she was perfectly satisfied to let everything over and above the $8 go back into the business.

"It's no fun at all to go good for you two! I get nothing at all out of it. I suspected I might have to be a carry-in for a bit, and here you are makin' money like a pair of old hands at the panicle business." Mrs. Page grumbled, delighted that we had made good. But her delight as far as I was concerned, was to be short-lived. In some way I contracted a bad cold; it settled on my chest, and while I dragged myself to the shop every day I felt far from well. Then one day I faintly. They took me home and put me to bed—"pneumonia," the doctor said. I was ill for weeks, but dear Mrs. Page refused to let them send me to a hospital.

"Sure, the poor dear can't afford to stay in a hospital, she's better off here with me than in a ward with ever Tom, Dick and Harry around her." She had had her way, and I stayed in my own little room.

Mary had to hire another girl to look after the house, and I was so weak that I could not do anything. I was in bed for weeks, but dear Mrs. Page refused to let them send me to a hospital.

"I said I'd pay you for pawning your jewelry some day," she told me when I said she was spoiling me. "This is part of the pay."

When I was better I made Mother and Aunt Susan a visit. I felt at first almost as if I were in Heaven, so calm and peaceful was it. Mother and I had so much to talk over.

But I could see that my coming to them had stretched Aunt Susan's resources to the limit. She was "proud" and would accept no board from me, although Mary sent me my $8 a week regularly. I had to have a physician and medicines for some time and Aunt Susan said if I attended to all the rest she gave me, I could board me—that I ought not to eat more than a bird any way.

Had she allowed me to have what she and Mother had, I would have been but little added expense. But she was constantly getting me extras, hoping to build me up more quickly.

When I became strong enough to go out of doors, I was delighted. I loved to potter about the flower garden, and to decorate the house with the lovely blooms. I never had been in the country, the real country or any length of time before. As a child, when Dad was alive, we always went either to the moon tains or the seashore. So everything was new and interesting to me.

One rainy day I rummaged in the attic. What a delightful place I found it! Quaint old furniture—battered beyond repair some of it; old-fashioned clothes—things Aunt Susan had as a girl, and which of one reason or another she had stored away; pictures of relatives—some of them also distant relatives of Mother's; bags of herbs—all sorts of odds and ends were there.

I had almost finished my search for entertainment, and was about to go down stairs and ask dozens of questions about some things I had discovered, when in a corner back of an old washstand, I found a typewriter. No miser ever floated over a bag of gold more than did I over that machine, so I was not surprised to find it in excellent condition, and a popular make, if it was an old model—as I afterward learned.

Although I was still weak, and it was heavy, I laid down all my other treasures and carried the typewriter down to the sitting room where Mother and Aunt Susan were fixing up my clothes for me.

"Everything must be in order when you go back, and I have always called a rainy day mending day," Aunt Susan said when I objected.

Tomorrow—Aunt Susan Tells a Story.

Hints for the Motorist
BY ALBERT L. CLOUGH
THE FRONT WHEELS
The two accompanying figures, illustrate in principle, typical front wheel construction and bearing support—wood wheels being shown here. A is the forked end of the axle. B the steering knuckle with its tapered axle stub. C and D a cross section of the wheel hub with the circular flange E, between which the hub shell D the inner ends of the spokes are secured by through bolts G, forming a wheel of the so-called artillery type. H is the metal hubcap, which is screwed into the outer end of the hub shell for the purpose of excluding dust from this end of the axle, and to confine the lubricant and to give finish to the wheel's appearance, with which it plays no constructional part. At J, Fig. 2 is shown a lubricant retaining dust shield to protect the inner bearing, consisting of rings fast to the axle and an annual felt washer held by them against the inside of the hub-shell. The road wheel not only has to support its share of the load and to withstand the severe shocks resulting from the irregularities of the road, but it also has to resist the violent side stresses, due to centrifugal force, that result when a car moves in a curved path. These latter forces, which tend to "dish" the wheels, that is, to throw the hub out of the plane of the spokes and rear or pull out the spoke; at the hub are, of course, transmitted through the wheel to the bearings, which very therefore be adapted to resist very severe and thrusts in line with the axle as well as the ordinary radial pressures at right-angles to the axle, that the weight of the car imposes. Hence it is general practice to employ in front wheels bearings either of the cup-and-cone or of the tapered roller type, both of which are adapted to perform the double duty—two bearings being employed in each wheel, one at the outer end and the other at the inner end of the hub. Fig. 1 shows a wheel provided with a pair of cup-and-cone bearings, in which L is a section of the cone of the inner bearing and M is a section of its cup, a "cage" of steel balls being confined between the accurately ground inner surfaces of these two parts. The cone L is fitted to the axle and the cup M is held against an internal shoulder in the hub. The outer bearing is the same in construction, but rests on the axle spindle. Nut O, with a washer under it, screws onto the threaded end of the axle spindle and is locked against turning thereon by a cotter pin. To adjust the bearings nut O is screwed on its thread, forcing the outer cone inward and relative drawing the inner cone outward and relative to the inner cone, until their respective cups are close to their cones so that the two sets of balls have just enough freedom of movement to permit their easy rolling, but not enough to allow undue wobbling of the wheel on the axle. If the end of the left wheel were provided with a right hand thread, forward motion of the car would tend to make this a left handed thread in general, used on this axle spindle and a right handed thread on the other. In Fig. 2 tapered roller bearings are shown in use, the bearing parts being somewhat exaggerated. Here N is a cross section of the inner race, fitted to the spindle and P is a section of the outer race of the inside bearing, set against an internal shoulder in the hub, and H is the ground surface of these two parts is a "cage" of tapered steel rollers. The outer bearing surfaces, to effect adjustment, nut O is turned into its thread, until the required wedge-like action between the inner and outer races of the two bearings, to cause the two sets of rollers to operate with the required freedom, but to avoid any undue end motion of the wheel on the axle, is secured. In both the types of wheel mountings shown the outer bearing resists forces tending to pull the wheel off its axle and the inner one resists stresses acting to crowd it on—both bearings serving to carry the load. Lubrication in both types is by means of lubricant—usually a thin grease—packed into the hub space between the two bearings or applied to the parts of each bearing before it is put into place in the hub.
