SANDRA THE JEALOUS By Jane Phelps

OPTIMISTIC YOUTH CHAPTER LXXXI.

On the train I spoke of Mother's visit to us, and thanked Everett for inviting her and Dad. "You do not need to thank me, Dear. Your Father and Mother will always be welcome in our home. The reason I did not wish them to come before, you know--I did not want you to appear to a disadvantage; neither did I want them to get the idea that you were an abused wife because I couldn't let you do as you pleased in all things. Your Mother was not keen that I should marry you--because of my age, so near her own. I felt sure I could make you happy if I had time. I may fall, but you have learned to handle yourself better, and shall no longer be denied the pleasure of entertaining your own people when you wish. "Thank you, Everett. May I have Buster and Toodles too, some time?" "Of course you may! Any time you like. They are great boys, both of them. I shall enjoy having them. Don't ask them during their school term. They are at an age when it is quite necessary their school routine should not be interrupted. But ask them in vacation." "That will be nice. I am so glad you like them." "No one could help liking the little buggers," which was great praise from Everett. Youth would not so often be disappointed if youth were not so optimistic. Because Everett had been good advantage in my home, because he had shown me attention, I built air castles of what he would do when we reached our own home again. He did not go up to the house with me, but stopped at the office to look over the mail. I asked to be allowed to wait, but he told me impatiently: "Drive on home, Sandra--I may be some time." "You will be home for dinner?" "Yes." He was only a little late, but as far as I was concerned he might as well have remained down town. I saw him, I heard him speak when he wished something, but as far as his knowing or caring about me--as I might as well have been looking at a picture of him placed in a chair at the foot of the table; or, talking with him over the long distance telephone where the service was so bad I had to wait an unconscionable time for an answer. I asked him if he found everything at the office all right. He made no reply. Added to the hurt of being ignored was the fact that he never confided in me in any way, that as far as his affairs went, I was a stranger. He had that firm, determined look on his face all through dinner that used to frighten me to speak, but which now made me feel so shut out. "Go to bed early. You look tired," he remarked as he rose from the table. "Are you going out?" a cold hand seemed to clutch my heart as I asked the question. Was he leaving me to hurry to Irma Barton? "Yes," shortly. "I may be late." He kissed me lightly, as if it made no difference whether he kissed or not, I thought bitterly as the front door closed and I stumbled up stairs, scarcely able to see for my tears. "Oh, Everett!" I said aloud when I reached my room, "I keep thinking you are going to be different and you never are. You just act as if you cared a little, then as if you didn't care at all." It was as if I said. The optimism engendered by his occasional show of affection, made harder the times like this when he seemed cold, hard, and unthoughtful of me. I had been so pleased at our welcome. All the servants, as well as Mrs. Gray, had seemed so pleased to see me. I felt they must like me to be glad to have me back. The dirt on Mrs. Gray's part, and cook had carried out her instructions faithfully. Had Everett only remained at home with me reading or smoking, I would have been perfectly happy. As it was, I was--perfectly miserable. Tomorrow--Sandra is impressed

ABOUT 170 years ago tea sold in England for $14.60 a pound. It was a luxury which only the wealthy could afford.

Thanks largely to the great increase in the area of tea plants under cultivation in India during the past fifty years, there is enough tea grown to-day to supply tea to the world at a price even the poorest can afford.

A cup of "good" tea--Red Rose Tea--costs only a fraction of a cent. There is hardly anything sold in the grocery store that gives more value or more pleasure for the money.

Consisting chiefly of ASSAM teas--the richest and strongest of Indian teas--Red Rose is exceedingly fragrant, flavory and economical. It is a tea of real quality and real value.

Sold only in sealed packages.
