CANADIAN CORVETTE ALBERNI SUNK WHILE ON INVASION DUTY

OTTAWA—Veteran of the Battle of the Atlantic and the invasion of North Africa, the Royal Canadian Navy Corvette, H.M.C.S. Alberni, has been sunk while on invasion duties with the loss of four officers and 55 ratings, about two-thirds of her crew, dead or missing, Angus L. Macdonald Minister, of National Defence for Naval Service, announced today. Survivors of the sinking included three officers and 28 ratings.

Announcement of the loss of the Alberni came within two weeks of the sinking of H.M.C.S. Regina, which was also on invasion duties when she went down. The Alberni is the 18th war vessel and eighth corvette lost by the Royal Canadian Navy.

Lieut. Cdr. Ian H. Bell, R.C.N.V.R. Vancouver, B.C. who has commanded the Alberni for the past two years, is a survivor.

One of the first Western Canadian corvettes to go on midocean escort duties, H M C S Alberni was built in Yarow's shipyards at Esquimalt, B.C., in 1940 and was commissioned February 3, 1941. In company with other western bilut corvettes, she steamed from the Pacific to the east coast in the early spring of 1941 and shortly afterward was sent to the mid-ocean convoy run.. She was on duty in that area for nearly a year and a half during the bitterest period of the Battle of the Atlantic when U-boat wolf packs were putting terrible presure on the northern life-line to the United Kingdom.

CHAPTER VI

OUT OF THE COUNTRY

"So you are the young man my niece is so fond of taking about," Lady Eldrick commented. "Do you play contract?"

"I regret to say. . ." John began "Never regret anything especially in the matter of card playing. Diana plays shockingly. Bids 'one clubs' on three doubtful tricks and passes with a fistful of spades She never will learn the 'four no trumps convention. You don't know what I'm babbling about, Mr. Morris?"

"Only a faint glimmer of comprehension."

"Ha! It is a wonder Sandley and his son haven't brought you out. They both play a good game. Have they never invited you?"

"No.

Lady Eldrick put the tip of a bejewelled finger between her teeth and contemplated him curiously. "Any relation to the Warwickshire Morris's she asked.

"Not so far as I am aware, Lady Eldrick."

"The Irish branch, then?

John shook his head vigorously.

The old lady grinned impishly. "I like a man who doesn't take a stepladder to get on his high-horse, she said cryptically. "Diana has told me all about you. Father's a village milkman, or something, isn't he?'

"He owns a small garage.

"That sounds quite fascinating. Is it a step higher up the social ladder than milk distribution?"

"I'm afraid I haven't the slightest idea.

"Evidently you don't care, either?

"Not to the smallest degree, Lady Eldrick.

"Not a snob?"

"I try not to be.

"Priggish?

"I can't answer that. It depends on what those who know me will make of me."

'Quite right! Then what do you mean by keeping my niece on tenterhooks?"

"Aunt Constance," Diana remonstrated.

"Be quiet child. I am handling his affair. I asked an honest question, and I await an answer."

"There are some matters I prefer not to discuss," John said somewhat stiffy.

"That won't do. I am far too old to be snubbed. When I was three years younger than Diana, I ran away with a groom. There was an awful rumpus about it. But we were riotously happy for five years, untill poor Harry passed away. Society professed to be scandalized, but they were probably thrilled and envious. I never regretted it. My second husband, well—comparisons are odious. Be very sure you are in love, and then obey the dictates of your conscience, young people."

"I am determined to be guided by what I think right," John exclaimed earnestly.

Lady Eldrick frowned. Perhaps John's outburst sounded a shade priggish.

"For pity's sake don't be put off by Sandley superiority. The Admrial is all right on the quarter deck. From what I've seen of you, young man, you're a out above the whole crowd when it comes to intelligence. And other things. I don't care a brass farthing whether your father is a butcher on a milkman. Never shall be able to remember his real business. Don't interrupt! I don't want to know. I guess him to be a fine, sturdy, God-fearing character.

"He is."

"And your mother with a light hand at pastry making?"

"That is also correct."

"How lucky you have been. Considering that Diana couldn't make a cheese-straw you'll be worse off when you marry. Candidly. I wouldn't recommend my niece if there is a wench available who has been brought up properly to cook and to sew."

Afterwards they laughed over the out-spoken dissertation, but John was still not convinced that he would be doing right to ask Diana to cut herself off from her family and her ways of life.

Lady Eldrick had him as a guest at one of her famous dinner parties. They were notable only for the diversity of ability of her guests.

Into this company John Morris slipped as into an overcoat made-to-measure. Conversation was maintained at a high level. The subject ranged from current politics to the Einstein theory, and the influence of music in factories.

"My best audience," the young pianist recounted "have been down in the East End of London and in the West End. The only moral I can draw from that is that musical appreciation has no established frontiers."

"What was your worst audience? questioned a Labour leader.

"Lady Eldrick, when I played for her privately."

The hostess made no secret of her abhorrence of highbrow composers.

A few months in London might have cured John completely of his inferiority complex. Removed from the back-ground of the county, where his dual nature was constantly called into activity, he was able to develop a better, wiser, sense of values.

"You are spreading your wings, John," Sir Charles told him. "It seems to me that you are really cut out for city life."

I'd hate to be pernanently among bricks and mortar, sir.

H'm! Well, you're expanding. I wish we could stay here longer.

But business called them home.

Back in the familiar scenes of his childhood John lapsed once more into morbid introspection.

MESSAGE FROM THE ADMIRAL

Conrad Sandley made things worse by dropping in for what he described as a "man-to-man chat. Boiled down, it meant that he wanted to make it clear that Diana was not destined to be the wife of a working man, even if that label was being stretched to include the agent of a large estate.

There was nothing crude in the way Sandley stated his case. It was well reasoned, logical and, in a way a direct appeal to the best side of John's nature.'

"You will grow out of this obsession." he persisted. "My sister, unfortunately, is very susceptible

"On what do you base that opinion?"

"My dear chap, we know Diana. She is always too ready to throw herself at any able man who happens to be deucedly good-looking into the bargain. Forfive me for putting it so bluntly."

The Leaque Of Mercy

The Salvation Army League of Mercy is a band of quiet, capable women who voluntarily visit hospitals, homes and institutions, bringing a word of hope or a cheery smile to someone in need, or providing a thoughtful little gift to a sick or lonely bed-patient. Their dark blue uniforms with touches of scarlet, are a constant reminder of the loving touch, and the understanding heart.

Home League members have war, has been to provide essential the-way communities as well as in larger centres, who are often in straightened circumstances. The object of the Home-League, is to better the Canadian home, and a membership of 10,000 in 370 communities is organized for the purpose of developing and maintaining high standards. This group also makes a point of visiting families whose sons and husbands have fallen in battle overseas, offering comfort and prayer wherever needed.

On the third of September, 1939, a patriotic group of women sprang into action, the Red Shield Women's Auxiliary. From a humble beginning, with their workroom in a downtown office building in Toronto, this organisation has grown until it now includes 50,000 in 1400 groups across the country. Their brought comfort, friendliness and purpose from the beginning of the instruction to housewives in out-of-comforts for servicemen, and also to assist victims of the British blitz by providing clothing of all kinds to young and old alike.

Since the beginning of the present war, more than a million garments have been passed through their hands.

The Salvation Army has been charged with assisting in the clothing, feeding and re-uniting of families of Europeans who have suffered so heavily under the Nazi heel. Their co-operation has been sought by the Canadian Government, and already extensive plans are in progress to cope with the tremendous problem of practical and immediate relief for the helpless sufferers of Occupied Europe. The Red Shield Women's Auxiliary is now in the process of collecting and shipping overseas one and a half million garments, which will be stored—ready for use—on the day peace is declared.

The Salvation Army Red Shield Home Front Appeal is a channel offered for helping The Army of Mercy.
