Further improvements in production.

Prof. Robertson in his Report says.— Since there is an active demand in the home markets of Canada, as well as in Great Britain, for fine creamery butter made during the winter, and since it is quite practicable to carry on the business in such a way as to produce a good article, which is needed in such further improvement in the methods of producing and handling milk and in the methods of manufacturing and marketing butter as will reduce the cost as low as possible and give the product the highest exchange value. At the dairyman's home-end of the business, there are difficulties still to be overcome.

A milking cow is a sensitive animal, and responds quickly in her milk-yield to favourable or unfavourable conditions. A comfortable stable is essential to profitable winter dairying. The requisites are that the stable be well lighted, and moderately warm. The temperature should not go below 45 degrees, nor above 65. It should be kept clean and the cows must be kept clean. Currying the cows once a day in the stable will often increase the yield of milk per cow, and add as much to the net revenue from the herd as though the price of butter was raised two cents a pound. An uncomfortable condition will prevent a cow from giving her maximum yield of milk, and will not conduce towards lasting milk be the best quality. Where the cow stables are cold and badly constructed, they may be made at least comfortable in a temporary way by nailing boards around the inside, and stuffing closely between them and the outside wall with straw.

It is a good plan to whitewash the inside of the cow stable twice a year. That practice in the stables of Great Britain has contributed greatly to the healthfulness of the cattle, and doubtless also to their productiveness.

The crop should be cut in the autumn before there is any risk of frost, which would damage it to some extent, if it came before the cutting was completed. After it is partly dried, it may be stored loosely, with the stalks standing on end in a shed, barn or loft. The stalks should never be laid on their sides in large bulk or they will heat and mould. If the corn be left in the field tied securely at the top by hay rope, straw rope, or binding twine, it will keep with little waste until later in the fall, when it can be taken to the barnyard, where contrivance can be made almost as serviceable for a small lot of corn as a silo. It is not a new plan for those who live in western Ontario, but it is new to the people in many parts in Canada. It consists in taking a number of forked stakes, and driving them into the ground. By laying poles in the forks, one can make a simple corn trestle by laying down a few old rails, like the base for a stack the corn can be placed on end, leaning against that trestle to the thickness of two or three feet on both sides. The ordinary rails or poles can be placed on the outside of the corn, on both sides, lengthwise, the whole being tied near the top of the pole by hay or straw ropes. Then, if a few boards be put on the top and on both sides, allowing them to overlap—they will shed all the rain. The corn stalks can be fed from the end, with little more waste than when the crop is put in a silo; and the outlay required for stooking or stacking it in that way is very little. Any man can make a contrivance of that kind in a few hours.
