BAYFIELD WILLIAMS, of Summerside, called at the office of the Department of Agriculture today. He reports ragwort rapidly spreading throughout Tyne Valley and that vicinity. He noticed cattle pasturing in a field of 10 acres or more which was completely covered with it. It is also very abundant along the roadsides. He says that it is mistaken by many of the people for golden rod to which it bears some resemblance when in blossom, as the color of both is a bright yellow. Ragwort is however more of a lemon color. In form the blossom bears a nearer resemblance to a bunch of daisies. The leaves are deeply scalloped, somewhat like those of common tansy and give off a disagreeable sickening odour when rubbed in the hand. The plants should be cut as soon as they come in blossoms to prevent the ripening of the seed which spreads very rapidly, owing to the tuft of bristles which is attached to each of the numerous seeds.
