AFRICA FLIGHT
By Val Glezard

Miss Wright lifted an admonishing forefinger, looking quite extraordinarily like a schoolmistress, thought Carol, remembering the wide windows and the sweep of downland of her school where she had first pinned a cut-out portrait of Rupert Larrimore beside her bed.

"Mr. Larrimore," said Cynthia Wright, "you've been talking a great deal about adventure, as if only men knew anything about it. That's great nonsense, if you don't mind my saying so. We may not fly the Pacific or go to the Poles—the ordinary woman's life is an adventure from the hour she is born to the moment she dies. It has to be. A woman's life is simply one long adventure. Men have to learn about it by bits and ends. It isn't so surprising if they get the point of view a little blurred. If you can take what's coming to you, so can Miss Manson."

She stopped and coughed. "I'm sorry I've said more than was my business," she concluded. Carol crossed the room and put her arms round Miss Wright's slim shoulders. "No wonder," she said, looking back at Larrimore over her shoulder. "That you're the secretary in London."

"Won't you come with us and show us the ropes?" inquired Larrimore, still faintly ironic. "You seem to know them pretty well!"

Carol made a face at him. Miss Wright showed no sign of appreciating the irony.

"Thank you, Mr. Larrimore," she said, "but I've my own adventures to think about, you know. Good luck to you both." The door closed behind her as quietly as it had opened. As the latch clicked Larrimore swept Carol into his arms. "Bless her!" he said hoarsely. "So you're coming?"

"I told you so."

"Just like that? No toothbrush or anything?"

"Just like that."

"Well," said Larrimore, perhaps Paris can supply the toothbrush. And the consulate there can supply the marriage-lines. I think we can count on good old Scotland Yard to give us a clear twenty-four hours."

He paused and looked down at her eager face.

"You don't think it's going to be any fun, do you Carol?" he asked anxiously.

Her eyes looked up at him altogether fearlessly. "I only know that this is going to be our real adventure," she said. "Kiss me—and then let's hurry."

His lips pressed hers.

"Bless you! Still sure?"

"Certain, Rupert."

His back straightened, as if suddenly on parade. "Right," he said sharply. "Let's go!"

cool shadows and a light breeze blowing down from the hills. It has been a day that brought folks home hungry from their hay and horses, sweat-stained to the drinking trough -- and Jamie at midday to dine with us--at a place already set for him. "That's funny," he said looking up from his plate. "were you expecting some one?"

Fish was our fare today, mackerel and cod from the fishman's truck, and to please James and betterpoint the flavors, pieces of fried bacon. Jamie's arrival is the signal to undertake a round of inspection. This disclosed that the swallows so recently in a nestful of five on the back verandah have left it deserted, since they found their new wings. Nor do they return to it in the evening, neither they nor their parents.

The blackbirds in residence in a woodpecker's fortress in a hollow tree have also flown, but robins still sing in the vicinity of the nest in the white birch on the lawn. So many scenes we must view that the hour had slipped away before we were aware of it and Jamie must be off with the rest to the work at the other farm. A wealth of personal seeds of his own gathering were tucked in a trouser pocket, a reminder to flower-lovers that this is the time and season to plant these colorful makings of next year's garden.

But in spite of its many delights and loveliness, it was a day which brought acute distress on occasion to Jeanie and me, when some of the livestock given over temporarily to our care broke out of confinement—a calf escaped from pasture, and a second calf granddaughter alone in its stall when unassisted she was putting a leading rope about its neck, an enter-inspection and instruction were carried over to a new organization known as the P. E. I. Dairy Association.

The committee, which had been duly appointed, met April 19, 1949 and drafted an act, which later became law, the committee becoming the provisional directors of the Association. Mr. Fraser T. Morrow was engaged as instructor in cheese and butter-making for seven months of the year at a salary of $100 per month, he meeting all his own expenses.

For some years the new set-up went along well, and the quality of Island cheese and butter rose to a very high standard, though the British markets reported the Island products as having the "Island flavour" due to milk cows feeding off the marshlands. That this objection was soon overcome is proved by the fact that dairy products from the Million Acre farm won high awards at Paris, Buffalo and other expositions where they went on display.

A lot of milk has flowed through the vats since 1901 when our combined dairy products stood at something over one and a half million dollars. Last year, one of the best in the dairy business, the gross value of butter alone totaled $3,077,728.81. Average net price of butter fat 79.58 cents. Average price received per lb. $68.75. Total net value of butter $2,860,309.01.

Aerial Elopement

The great limousine tore on through the night. In one corner was sitting Sir George Manson, an unlighted cigar disregarded between the gloved fingers of his right hand, his eyes fixed unwinkingly upon the speedometer on the lighted dashboard, as the needle crept up to seventy, to seventy-five, to eighty miles an hour. Now and then he snapped an impatient order to hurry to the chauffeur's impassive back. In the other corner sat Cynthia Wright, her back very stiff, her mouth very tight. The sort of scene through which she had just passed with her employer had been as unedifying as it had been unusual.

"What you can have been thinking of, Cynthia," said Sir George at last, "is beyond me!"

Miss Wright did not reply.

"Oh, very well, very well," went on Sir George. "I apologize for anything I may have said. I lost my temper. Was it so surprising?"

"I withdraw my resignation, if that is what you want," said Miss Wright coldly, "but I don't change my opinion for a moment. You should let them go."

To that Sir George only replied with a snort. The car lurched, swerved, and leaped forward.

"Dash these roads!" snapped Sir George. "How much farther for Heaven's sake, Gates?"

Gates was understood to say that they were on the last lap. And almost immediately the car swung out on to a length of clear road with no bordering hedges.

"Straight into the aerodrome!" ordered Sir George.

But Miss Wright put a hand on his arm with an exclamation, and Gates jammed on his brakes.

Straight towards the road a dim winged shape was racing, its engine roaring at a steady crescendo. Sir George wrenched open the door of the car, and sprang on to the road, waving his arms, and shouting incoherently. The plane swerved slightly, as though sentient of his presence. Sir George had a moment's glimpse of the face of Rupert Larrimore and Carol, in the dim light from the instrument board of the machine. Then the plane lifted, its wheels spinning languidly, passed not more than ten feet above the level of Sir George's head, and drove south-westward into the darkness.

"Beaten on the post," muttered George Manson unsteadily, peering after the tiny vanishing wing lights. "The fool! The silly young fool!"

He stumbled back towards the car.

Cynthia Wright put a hand gently on his arm. "Did you see?" she asked.

"See what? I saw their faces—if that's what you mean!"

"Then you saw how unbelievably happy they looked," said Cynthia Wright.
