"Pushing the chest and trunk forward while in a stooping position is a reducing exercise—it makes one lean."

"My maid wears a flesh-colored one-piece bathing suit."
"That's vulgar!"
"Nothing of the sort! She's a colored maid."

Reggie: Gracious, Miss Sharpe, my head is rattling today like a tin box. I don't know what's the matter.
Miss S.: I have a can opener handy, if you care to investigate, Mr. Sapp.

Indian Brave: We're being ill-used—let's go on the warpath."
Indian Not So Brave: Nothing doing; that ole warpath is a ma-cadamed road now.

SUMMERS FINDS A CLUE

But the queerest part of the whole affair, in Summers' estimation was the fact that the news of the murder had reached him shortly after Ferryman had told him the story of his missing wife. This was one of those coincidences which Summers always viewed with suspicion.

It was somewhat modified, of course, by the fact that the woman had been dead for ten or twelve hours when the body was found, yet it gave the captain a great deal to think of as he went from room to room on his tour of inspection.

Every room was furnished in good taste and arranged in perfect order. Here and there were odd little touches which showed how Ferryman had endeavored to maintain everything in its original state. Yet the house seemed in need of the living, human breath to vitalize it. A sense of emptiness and grief was lurking in the dim nooks and corners, waiting for the enlivening touch of sun and air and laughter.

Summers went from room to room, finding nothing of significance and having no clear idea of what he expected to find. He was merely fixing the arrangement of the house in his mind while he waited. At length he entered a great oak-paneled room that appeared to be the library.

There were books and pictures and curios that bespoke a culture and diversified taste, and cozy nooks and easy-chairs that testified to a desire for ease and comfort. The feeling of vacancy and abandonment was less noticeable here than in the other parts of the house. In a vague fashion Summers felt that the big morris chair at the table looked just as if some one might have sat in it only yesterday.

He sat down in it himself spread out his disproportionately short legs, and let his eyes rove over the great room with its high ceilings, its handsome oak paneling and its soft-hued rugs of Oriental pattern. It was here, so Mr. Ferryman had told him, that some of the strange things reported by the caretaker had happened.

Axelson had heard sounds of trespassing coming from this room, and, upon entering to investigate, a green light had been flashed in his eyes. It had disappeared in an instant, leaving no explanation in its trail. Summers had thought it rather strange, but not particularly startling. Since then the discovery of a woman's body in the house had given an element of importance to the most trifling details.

"A green light, Summers muttered. He scratched his top-heavy head and scowled. "What would anybody want with a green light?"

He got up and crossed over to an electric switch on the wall. He touched it, and a soft electric light sprang up in various places and flooded the room. It was just an ordinary white light, without the faintest trace of green.

Summers fingered his jaw and reflected. Axelson might be the excitable sort that is easily mistaken. Possibly the green light had flashed only in his imagination. But, if so, why should he have imagined a green light in particular? Why not a blue or an orange one? Perhaps—

A CIGAR BAND

But Summers decided he would let his speculations rest for the present. Later he would test Axelson's capacity for accurate observation, with emphasis on his ability to distinguish different colors. It would be time enough for that in the afternoon. Summers' luncheon hour was already past, and he was hungry.

McCabe and his colleague could be trusted to conduct the preliminary inquiries and make satisfactory notes.

He switched off the light and moved to the door. It happened to be the wrong door as he discovered in a moment. It opened only into a short hall, which in turn communicated with what appeared to be a music room. He looked in, then started to retrace his steps and find the right way out, but something made him look down. Nesting in the fabric of a rug lay a small bright object which upon investigation proved to be a cigar band.

"Verona," read the embossed inscription on the label. It was the kind of label that adorns only expensive cigars. Summers happened to know something about this particular brand, and he was aware that it was a very rare one. Only one person in his acquaintance smoked it—a certain fastidious gentleman who ate drank and smoked only the best. Summers' eyes narrowed. A hard, knowing grin touched his lips. With the cigar band resting in his palm he looked down at the spot where he had found it. To be sure, it was far-fetched to suppose that it had been dropped there by the particular person he had in mind, yet his thoughts circled around the idea. It seemed to tickle his fancy in a sardonic way.

The fastidious gentleman in question was also a very cautious and adroit individual, one who would scarcely be likely to drop a clue in such a careless manner. He would be even less likely—granting that Summers' hazy surmise was correct—to smoke a cigar in a strange house especially if bent upon an errand of the sort with which Summers always associated his name.

"But you can never tell," was this thought as he carefully tucked the band away in his notebook. "He mightn't have smoked the cigar here. Maybe the band came loose in his pocket and fell out when he reached for his pencil or watch or something. Any how—"

Summers left the hall and returned to the library. He had already seen a smoking stand beside the library table, and among other articles there was a box of cigars. Probably it had stood there untouched since Ferryman fled from the painful associations of the house and moved next door. The captain opened the box and examined one of the cigars. It was dry and brittle.

"Eclipsias," he observed. His mind was a crowded storehouse of miscellaneous information, and among other things he happened to know a great deal about the various brands of cigars and the type of men who smoked them. "A man who smokes Verona never smokes Eclipsias—that's one sure thing."

Satisfied with his discovery, inconclusive though it was, he went out to luncheon. His favorite restaurant was some distance away, on the other side of the Washington Square section, but the food was good enough to compensate one for going out of his way. At this late hour the place was almost deserted. His eyes lighted upon a lone individual at a table in the rear.

MARTIN DALE

He smiled grimly and walked down the aisle between the tables. "Hello, Dale. Mind if I join you?" And without waiting for an answer he sat down.

Martin Dale's face brightened. He looked as fresh and keen as if he had just emerged from his morning shower. Every little detail of his appearance seemed to blend into a life devoted to intriguing and congenial pursuits. His cravat was just the right shade, the cuff links in the soft shirt, of faint lavender were just the right pattern. His eyes were frank and open, yet they did not tell everything, but seemed to hold something in reserve for another hour and another occasion.

"This is luck, Summers," he declared. "You know how I detest eating alone. It was just longing for the sight of a familiar face, and there is no face in the world I would rather see than yours."

Summers grumbled something and consulted the menu.

"I can recommend the broiled squab," said Dale.

When the fat Latin proprietor appeared to declare himself honored and to take personally his valued guest's order, Summers requested broiled squab, Dale's suggestions were invariably sound.

"You look a bit glum," Dale observed, studying him out of his lively gray eyes.

"Do I?" "You do. All the way from brains to bunions you are the picture of dejection."

"I haven't any bunions." "Then it must be some other affliction. But maybe that's a rash deduction. Come to think of it, old top, you are the only man I know whose face is no index to his state of mind. You never look what you look. In your most hilarious moments you look like an honorary pain-bearer. Judging your present sour mein by what I know of your eccentricities, I should say you had something up your sleeve."

"You're talking rot." "Maybe so. There is a very fine distinction between rot and profundity, old dear. Seriously, though, if there is nothing up your sleeve, suppose you prove it by shaking it. If nothing falls out, then I'll believe you."

"Oh, go chase yourself. There's nothing up my sleeve except a pink rabbit and a two-headed baby elephant." "I'll wager there is one more thing." "It'll wager there is one more thing." A sly gleam of merriment came into

P. E. I. United Church Presbytery

The Presbytery of Prince Edward Island United Church of Canada, met in regular session in Trinity United Church, Summerside, on Tuesday, the new Chairman, Rev. J. Stirling presided over a large representation, lay and clerical.

Rev. John Coburn, of the Board of Social Service and Evangelism being present was welcomed to the court.

At noon, the Court united in a very impressive devotional service. Revs. Dr. Ramsay, Mr. Somers and Mr. Nicholson gave helpful addresses.

The Hospital Chaplaincy committee reported progress and suggested that in the meantime the ministers in the vicinity of Charlottetown endeavour to visit those of their people who might be in P. E. I. hospital, thus relieving the Charlottetown ministers to an extent. This is already being done. This interim report was accepted and the committee continues.

A communication from the P. E. I. Ministerial Association was discussed regarding the support of the Lord's Day Alliance. The Ministerial Association accepted a budget of a thousand dollars for this year. The congregations of the United Church are asked to assist in raising this amount. It was pointed out that the Lord's Day Alliance institutes correspondence with the Attorney General of the province, and with the heads of corporations regarding infractions of law. No prosecution can be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General. The Alliance has as its principal work the safeguarding of the Lord's Day in its legislative and national aspects. It contests at its own expense any case in which a new principle is involved, that in Manitoba for example. The Canadian Sunday stands far above that of all other countries and this condition is made possible by the un-

What Flowers on the Kitchen Range?

This may seem strange—but Electric Cookery is so cool that flowers can be kept as fresh on top of the range as anywhere else. Heavily insulated oven walls hold the heat inside. Little escapes to increase the temperature of your kitchen. Top burner heat is concentrated on the bottoms of the utensils where it is needed for cooking.
