field of religious stories, especially when those stories were well chosen and portrayed with genuine art.

True, there are no mass conversions to record; people are not flocking to the churches in much greater numbers; their moral lives have not noticeably changed; but the men are experiencing more soul-satisfying than a materialistic civilization has to offer.

Equally significant, perhaps, is the multiplication of articles and columns on religious topics in the secular magazines and daily newspapers, journals which a decade or two ago would have regarded this as a daring innovation.

The motion pictures, too, have encountered a gratifying response in their few ventures into the

IN MEMORIAM

In loving memory of John J. Creighton, who passed away November 6th, 1948.

As a wonderful father, we think of you. In memories that are fond and true; There wasn't a thing, big or small, That you wouldn't try to do for us all. It's sad but true, and we wonder why. The best are always the first to die. Quickly and quietly came the call. Your sudden death surprised us all. We have lost, but God has gained. One of the best the world contained. Ever Remembered by the Family.

Literature And Life

By BOOKMAN

THE GOETHE BICENTENARY

In his "Memorial Verses" on Wordsworth, published in 1850, Matthew Arnold pays his respects to Byron and Goethe before dealing with the poet of the lakes. He said that "Byron had taught us little, but that we had felt him like the thunders roll." Of Goethe he said:

"When Goethe's death was told Herdler who opened his eyes to the power of simple passionate speech in the ballad. Another great influence was Schiller. It was he who brought him back to his proper task of poetry, for Goethe's versatility was a temptation. He it was too who got him to return to "Faust" and finish it. Spinoza, the lens grinder, was a powerful influence in his life. He has had tremendous effect on mankind since, for he gave a great impetus to thought and culture in the best sense. Some of his lines go as deep as life itself. This one from the closing scene of "Faust": The angels sing as they bear Faust's soul above. "He who strives without ceasing, him we save," so like Browning's theory that "he who strives is succeeding." To be "eternally unsatisfied" is a sort of gospel according to Goethe. His last words were typical of his life. Drawing with his finger pictures in the air, he murmured a last cry for "more light." He was a "physician" to use Matthew Arnold's word, but as Hutton said: He knew all symptoms of disease, a few alleviations, no remedies, but surely few ever taught the duty of developing one's individual powers with more earnestness than he.

Recently Dr. Albert Schweitzer visited America and spoke on the personality and work of Goethe, on whom he is the greatest living authority. This man — doctor, philosopher, linguist, musician, author, theologian, missionary, is spending his life among the people of equatorial Africa and has been there for 36 years; Some say the greatest man alive. I recall reading many years ago that Goethe said a man could do almost anything if he made up his mind to do it. Surely a tonic needed in our day!

Realizing Limitations

Science as we understand it today, meaning the knowledge of observational and experimental facts, can neither tell us that God exists nor that He does not exist; neither can it demonstrate our dependence on Him nor explain our duties toward Him. These truths, not being reducible to the observable and experimental, are beyond its competence. For God is a Spirit and cannot be seen with bodily eyes.

In fact, science itself is becoming more and more aware of its own limitations, and some scientists are recognizing that there are other approaches to reality equally valid. It is not more so, with the scientific paths of observation and experimentation.

With all due respect to the wonderful achievements of science, it must be said that science alone is unable to provide us with the basic truths of the origin and purposes of human existence which men's minds are craving to know. These are properly religious truths, and the fact that men are hungering for them, nor did it pre-empt our day; but the fact that many are beginning to perceive the true nature of their hunger and are turning to religion to satisfy it, is like the first harbinger of a new spring.
