A Forewarning Against "Nipped" Radiators

Cars Not Snugly Housed Are In Danger Earliest

THIS WORD OF WARNING is being sent out early so that it may reach readers before freezing weather sets in, even in the [illegible] sections of the country and is intended especially for those who have been leaving their cars out of doors or in open [illegible] at night during the summer. Cars that are housed in tight buildings are likely to be safe until later in the season. Every motorist should realize that a motorcar radiator is, so to speak, "built to freeze," that is, it is constructed to part with the heat in its water as rapidly as possible and is the most vulnerable to frost of all man's devices. The radiator itself, apart from its upper and lower tanks, contains but little water and this is in thin films surrounded by air cells or in tubes of small area and thus a very short exposure to air below the frost point is bound to freeze their contents. The water in the engine jackets and pump, being in larger masses and less exposed, will resist freezing when that in the radiator itself will congeal. The water of all cars that are left exposed to outside temperature should be completely drawn off every night that there is any reasonable chance of the mercury falling to freezing. Clear, still nights, with the temperature down to 45° at 9 o'clock, generally bring frosts. The water must be all removed from the cooling system but especially from the radiator. Opening the draw-off at the radiator bottom is sometimes deceptive, as it may be clogged with sediment and the opening is wrong on, and it is best to run a wire up through it to prevent this. A radiator containing [illegible] may fail to drain completely, because the lower ends of [illegible] may be obstructed and the undrained passages may freeze. This is a reason why cleaning out the radiator is advised at the onset of cold weather. Unless as much water drains out of the cooling system as the system is designed to contain, some stopping of liquid in [illegible] passages may be suspected. If a car is thoroughly [illegible] for the night and the probability of a [illegible] frost is not [illegible] "take a chance" if one cares to and not drain the system, [illegible] hood and especially the radiator front closely and heavily [illegible]. Of course, all the above bother can be avoided by the early use of freeze mixture, but so long as cold nights are only the exception and warm days prevail few motorists care to begin using it.

ONE CYLINDER "DEAD" AT LOW THROTTLE

P. F. writes: One cylinder of my six does not explode or fires only once in a while when my engine is running idle or driving the car very slowly, but when I give more gas it begins to work. Why should this be so and is there any remedy?

Answer: It is because the cylinder does not receive or retain gas enough to be ignitable when the throttle is nearly closed. Probably this is because there is an air leak into this cylinder which dilutes the charge below the point of inflammability, or it may be that the valves or rings are so leaky that much of the charge escapes during compression. The result of either of these defects is pronounced in proportion to the degree of throttling and does not prevent firing when fuller charges are being admitted. If air leaks and compression leaks can be eliminated this trouble should cease.

REDUCED WATER CAPACITY

L. E. C. writes: Since having a crack welded in the cylinder block of my engine, the water heats to the boiling point after [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] it [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] operation? I notice that [illegible] [illegible] does not hold as much as [illegible] used to.

Answer: It seems [illegible] that the welding operation [illegible] anything to do with reducing [illegible] circulation or with reducing [illegible] capacity of the system. Your statement that the radiator holds less water than it should makes us suspect that it is partly clogged. We suggest that you start the engine and see if the radiator warms up equally at all parts. It would not be surprising if you found that there were some comparatively cold portions through which the water did not flow. This would reduce the cooling capacity of the system and account for your trouble. Cleaning out the radiator is in the remedy. Most often in cases where the system holds less water than it should it is found that water [illegible] in certain parts of the radiator [illegible] does not escape when the drain cock is opened.

Patty Comes

Chapter 6

Patricia Parke was all that a girl recently 20 years old ought to be. On the surface she was a slender, medium sized girl, with very fair hair, almost flaxen in color, with enough wave to make it comb easily into any desired sort of style. She had, at this moment, very pretty gray eyes, at this moment because she wore a gray traveling suit. In a certain evening gown of turquoise velvet, her eyes were blue as a summer sky.

She had nice features, quite like her sister's. There the family resemblance stopped. Patty's skin was fair inclined to pallor; but when she was happy, flushed with a faint pink, a pink so delicate it seemed to be laid on under the skin as the color in exquisite china seems to exist far under the fine surface.

The family naturally went to meet the through train from Portland to St. Louis which stopped on signal at Wissekeagan. Patty was officially helped off by a colored porter, the only passenger to alight. Millie felt it was all quite important and thought of the large item that the "Local News" would print about this impressive arrival of "one of Wissakeagan's old residenters."

Humphrey bundled them all into his car and left them alone in Mrs. Parke's house. They were all to have supper together there later.

"Did you have a nice trip? Tell us all about it. Did you bring any new clothes?" Millie asked, attaching perhaps more importance to the clothes and the styles than the arrival of her sister.

Patty laughed and began opening trunks.

"Heaps," she said. "You see, the Portland trip was a quick one. I bought all of us the latest Spring fashions in New York."

She began bringing them out, a blouse cut in an entirely new way which Millie declared the very thing for her new skirt, a net shall studded with glistening beads for her mother, who had a passion for little wraps and shawls, hats and gloves and silk stockings with openwork clocks in fact, a varied assortment of silly feminine things which delighted both women.

Millie was not envious until Patty's own things came out. She had so many dresses and they were all so charming and so different from anything Wissakegan had seen!

"You must have been making a lot of money as a travelling companion," Millie commented admiringly, wondering whether she could send her another dress like the blue velvet.

Patty laughed again.

"I didn't. I spent most of my money on you and mother. My clothes are made over from Mrs. Grainger-Munn's old things. You see, when she went in mourning for Mary, she put away all her colored clothes. Last winter she gave them to me and I've made them over."

Millie ceased to be envious. After all, these lovely gowns were only second hand! She began to feel slightly patronizing toward Patty since she herself could always afford to buy things quite brand new. But Patty was quite oblivious to all this.

Millie was anxious to have a long talk with her sister. But she did not have an opportunity until the following day, when she ran over to see her. She wore the charmeuse skirt by way of impression Patty that after all Wissakeagan produced some fashionable things.

"Cora is coming to lunch," she said. "She'll want to see all your New York clothes, of course. But you mustn't tell her that they were given to you or that you made them from somebody's old clothes."

Patty turned a pair of very astonished gray eyes upon her sister. Then, her usual way out of embarrassing difficulties, she began to laugh.

"I wouldn't be likely to tell her so, since after all it's none of her affair," she remarked. "As for old clothes I don't believe Mrs. Munn wore them more than once, some of them not at all.

"You see, Mary died a little over a year ago just after her mother got back from Paris with some of these things and with a whole wardrobe for Mary herself. She would not give me those things, of course, she said it would hurt her to know they were being worn by anyone else. She had them burnt."

"I want to know more about Mary. Your letters were so short. But what Millie wanted mostly was to talk about herself. And looking from the window watching Cora, she saw her own husband coming up to the house.

"I haven't seen near enough of little sister," he bounced out as he entered the room. "So I've come up to sea with you. Hello, Millie, you don't look overjoyed."

A sudden tiny dart of jealously, though of her own sister, had come into Millie's heart.

Monday—Growing Jealousy

Modern Mothers Neglect Children, Declares Rector

WASHINGTON, Nov. 25.—"The burning issue of the hour is what is to be done with the youth of America," so said Rev. James Freeman, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, before the delegates of the twenty-fifth annual convention of the Sunday School Institute of the Diocese of Washington.

That there is not enough power in the legislative halls to save America from ultimate ruin and decay unless the ideals of home and childhood are conserved was pointed out by the preacher.

Dr. Freeman declared that the secularization of education was one of the principal causes of the decadence in child life today. He said that no ethical, moral or religious teaching of children need be expected from the schools for children and that America is raising up a set of lusty young pagans that sooner or later, unless checked, will play havoc with American institutions.

The speaker warned the delegates that if the Church of today does not win the children there will be no congregations in American churches within two decades. He insisted that the first reformation must be in the home life of the country.

Dr. Freeman flayed the carelessness of modern parents who allow their children to attend unsupervised motion pictures; read books which they have not examined, and indulge in social habits that are destroying the virtues of the American home. Dr. Freeman pointed out that the classics no longer are popular and that the only popular books are the big sellers of the day, too often dealing with unwise topics.

He Fell In Love With The Bride

MILWAUKEE, Nov. 25.—Federal authorities here have unearthed a traffic in "picture brides" which has been netting the manipulators of a nation-wide matrimonial syndicate big profits from Germans. A raid on a barber shop and photograph studio resulted in discovery of hundreds of photographs from Germany many of girls of ages from 16 to 30 and matrons of 35 and 40. Prospective husbands were given their choice in marrying any of the "picture brides" for payment of sums alleged to cover transportaion from Berlin, Hamburg, Leipsic and other large German cities to the United States.

It is said many of the "picture bride" marriages were performed and letters were found from satisfied bridegrooms.

Brides are said to have been brought from New York to Milwaukee. The discovery of the traffic resulted from the local matrimonial agent falling in love with one of the bridesaimself. He is reported to have informed the "picture bride" that he was the bridegroom and not the agent, and after spiriting the girl away to Minneapolis was never heard from again. Neither did the prospective bridegroom receive any of his money in return.

Woman Recluse Is Strangled

NEW YORK, Nov. 25.—The body of Mrs. Elizabeth Maier, 82 was found lying on the kitchen floor of her home at edge of the Hempstead Plains near Hicksville, L. I. She had been murdered, strangled with a strip of cloth torn from a sheet, and the house had been ransacked from top to bottom in a search for valuables.

The little three room house in which the murder was committed, and where Mrs. Maier had lived alone for twenty six years, is only ten miles from the house in which Mrs. Minnie S. Bartlett was murdered last June by Lawrence Kubal, a Polish laborer who is now awaiting the execution of the death sentence in Sing Sing prison.

Dr. Adolph Rave, of Hicksville, examined the body of Mrs. Maier soon after it was found by Mrs. Paul Scrader, a neighbor, and said he believed the woman had been dead eight or ten hours. So far as the police have been able to learn from Mrs. Maier's relatives, the woman had no jewelry or money in the house.

FORESTRY AND THE FLYING MAN

It is only fair that the flying machine should prove a valuable aid to forest protection, because it is scarcely too much to say that were it not for the forest there could be no flying machine. The framework of the airplane must not weigh a pound more than is absolutely necessary to ensure the requisite strength. Not only does the life of the airman depend upon the steel stays and the linen wings but, mainly, it depends upon the strength and toughness of the wooden scantlings and rods that are the backbone, the ribs, and the wing-bones of the machine. The wood used is practically all Sitwa spruce, a species, which as its name indicates is found on the north Pacific coast of North America, and chiefly in British Columbia. The airplane designer wants to know just how light he can make these rods without endangering the safety of his machine. To find this out and also to ascertain the other qualities of Sitka spruce was the object of an investigation involvng several thousand tests made by the Forest Products Laboratories of Canada. The conclusions which also indicate the other uses to which this wood can be put are published in the Illustrated Bulletin No. 71 "Canadian Sitka Spruce: Its Mechanical and Physical Properties." Copies of this bulletin may be had free upon application to the Director of Forestry, Ottawa.

AIRPLANE AND FOREST FIRES

Recently the initial trip was made from Kamloops, British Columbia, of a new airplane which had been flown up from Vancouver to be used in patrol work over the forests in that district administered by the Dominion Forestry Branch. The machine in use earlier in the season was returned to new plane was piloted by Major McLaurin of Vancouver and with him on this trip were Mr. D. Roy Cameron, district forest inspector, and Mr. J. A. Wilson, of Ottawa, secretary of the Air Board of Canada. The trip of 250 miles was made in three hours and twenty minutes. There had been a smoke haze for some days, which had made detection of fires from the lookout stations difficult and the use of the airplane with its great range of visibility overcame this. No fires which Forestry Branch officers did not know of were discovered but from the airplane the fires were classified according to their size and importance, so that suppression measures could be directed accordingly. In fact so detailed was the observation carried out by the district forest inspector that those in the plane could see the fire-fighters clearly and the kind of work they were doing.

High Ideals

C. E. MacKenzie

Improving the general standing of the community is one of the many duties of the thougatful man or woman and appears to me as a question that should occupy the minds of all rural section. Suppose we take up the question: "Why have so many people migrated to the cities and why do most farm boys tire of their work and surroundings at some time in early life? The answer to the first question is, lack of agricultural education. So much farm work has been done and is still being done without knowing why. Almost the first thing the boy questions when asked to do some simple task is why? and if we who are older and have acquired the knowledge by experience will only take the trouble to explain even these trival tasks we will be going a long way in awakening the love of the country in the mind of the child.

Not long ago I heard a boy say that his father asked him to do certain work on the farm but did not tell him why it should be done. The young farmer wants to know and if he cannot get the answer he is almost sure to loose interest in his work and begin to thing it would be better to work at something else. This task of agricultural education is the cause of many mistakes in the management of the farm, and these mistakes cause many losses which in turn cause discouragement and eventually lead many people to leave the good old homestead for greener fields only to meat stern conditions.

To illustrate the above let me give you an actual case. A farmer had a flock of sheep twenty in number which he kept in a small barn at some distance from his other buildings. This flock was fed by one of the farmer's sons, a boy in his early teens and every night he closed the door tight, ere long most of these sheep sickened and died as the place was too warm for them; had this lad's father taken the trouble to tell his son how sheep should have been looked after he would have made more money and also have taught the boy something that would have been of some use to aim through life.

Again boys are often discouraged by not being appreciated, he has often to work day in and day out without having a "well done" spoken by parent or friend, when this little bit of encouragement would have made a vast difference to him.

In contract with this let us see how it fares with the boy who leaves home for some industrial centre where he often works seven days of the week and often in a few years makes a little money and returns home on a visit. Notice the people of the community welcome him, and hear them say so many nice things about him and invite him to visit in their homes. The young man who remained at home and kept things going down on the farm, paid the taxes and probably a mortgage, is looking on. Does he ever get a work of encoragement?

Another reason why so many boys leave the farm is because we farmers are so slow to organize and work together for our own good, in many districts farmers are working against each other and if one gets along better than his neighbors they, in place of adopting his system, become envious and often bitter feelings ensue

This condition of affairs is very unpleasant to the young folk and they often leave the old home in search of more congenial surroundings.

Lack of public conveniences is also a factor, for instance almost any rural community could have a good telephone system for not more than one hundred dollars from each farmer if the whole community would come in and what is this investment of merely say six dollars per year for the actual save and rendered sociability of the people concerned. Other improvements might be mentioned such as a community electric light and power plant and we have hundreds of streams yet unharnessed in this province which if hitched up would revolutionize rural conditions. These have been pointed out as to what we might have, and now what is the remedy?

First Agricultural education and it must be taught to the boys and girls when they are young. Second a higher ideal for the farmer. He should realize that farming is the noblest profession and third, organization for to put it in a nutshell the farmers united are able to overcome any difficulty and become a controlling power in the affairs of our country.

The pessimist regards the world as a great big junk heap of broken promises and wasted opportunities. The optimist buys the junk.
