Life In French Prison

(By Dominion News Service.)

LONDON, Aug. 24.—The writer of the following article, a young Englishman, has recently completed a sentence of imprisonment in France. It should be explained that the "crime" of which he was accused would, in this country, have involved him, at most, in civil court proceedings.

Some time ago I was guilty of an indiscretion which, in France, is regarded as a "crime." Subsequently a friend came to my Paris hotel with the news that the facts had been reported to the Prefecture.

A few mornings later two detectives stopped me in the street and asked me to accompany them to the Prefecture. Here I was searched and my braces, tie, suspenders, collar, and shoe laces were taken from me. After six hours spent in an ante-room, I was questioned, and then told that I should be placed under arrest until a Juge d'Instruction investigated the complaint brought against me.

In the evening I was removed to the depot at the Palais de Justice, and it seemed that the next 24 hours were entirely taken up with measurements, photographs, and the completion of various forms.

At the depot I shared a cell with a young Frenchman who was very quiet and very kind t ome. In a quiet and very kind to me. In a he had been arrested the previous day for a small matter of murder, which he had committed a few days previously.

After two days I was removed to the famous Sante Prison. "Le Sante" is a sort of clearing house and generally holds over 1,000 persons awaiting investigation, trial, deportation or the settlement of debt. It is an old building, very large, very dirty and very damp.

You are awakened at seven in the morning and your cell is unlocked at 7.30. At 8 you are given a loaf of dark yellow bread (something worse than the ration bread in England during the war) and a bowl of soup made from vegetables, chiefly carrots and cabbage. At four in the afternoon you are given a second bowl of soup, made from lentils, haricot beans, or rice, and that completes the amount of food you are allowed free.

Fortunately there is a canteen, from which you are allowed to make purchases daily. During my stay at the Sante my account with the canteen averaged between eight and nine francs, for which I got coffee at 7.45 in the morning, a meat dish at mid-day, and some vegetables, chiefly potatoes, at five in the afternoon, in addition to white bread, beer or wine, etc. One could also buy incidental things, such as underclothing, socks and soap.

On five days a week you could buy tobacco—smoking being permitted—once a week you could buy French classical books, and twice a month you were allowed to purchase the better-class French magazines.

You are permitted to write and receive as many letters as you please, but the loneliness is terrible.

I was in the Sante for nearly four months, and for the period of five weeks I spoke only to the warder and the canteen attendant.

All the time alone. Towards the end one's thoughts, one's imagination, one's general state of health, are almost beyond description. At times I was nearly hysterical.

I made two appearances before the Juge d'Instruction, a sort of official referee. He was a charming man, absolutely unbiased and to the best of his ability assisted both the complainant and myself.

My trial was conducted before three judges about six weeks after my arrest.

Unfortunately for me and my defence certain important documents had not arrived from England. Not until a week before the trial was I in a position to make proper arrangements for my defence, and the result was that I was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, which my lawyer and I both thought very severe.

Under French law a prisoner has the right, within 10 days after sentence, to lodge an appeal. This I did immediately, remaining, in consequence, at the Sante until a few days before the appeal was to be heard, when I was removed to the Conciergerie.

The time of waiting, however, was much longer than I had anticipated, or than is usual, and I had only a few days of my sentence to serve when the appeal came on. One is allowed the right to renounce one's appeal, and accept the original sentence, and I did so.

I was now removed to Fresnes, the chief prison of France. Here I was really treated as a convict.

Fresnes is a colossal place, and spotlessly clean. Discipline is very strict. The food is the same as at the Sante except that the purchase of an additional food from the canteen is allowed only to the value of 1.50 francs per day.

When one goes to exercise, which is much longer, or moves about the prison, one wears a linen head and face cover, with two holes cut into it for the eyes, one's face being completely hidden.

My prison work was the making of fans, which was very light and interesting. At Fresnes the day was longer, and there was no smoking, reading, or letter writing, but with the work and the much cleaner and quieter conditions, I was much more comfortable and contented than at the Sante.

It is only fair to try to place on record the wonderful kindness and sympathy shown me by those who carry on the antiquated French judicial system.

The kindness, sympathy, and courtesy I received from the Juge d'Instruction, the officials, and the warders were little short of wonderful, and were all the more amazing to me, seeing the types of person who passed through their hands.

MANY IDEAS ON LINCOLN WRONG, EDUCATOR SAYS

(Associated Press.)

URBANA, Ill., August 24.—To prove what he states is the falsity of some of the current beliefs and conclusions as expressed in much of the literature on Abraham Lincoln, Dr. D. K. Dodge of the department of English, University of Illinois, this school year will conduct a course in Lincoln's letters and speeches. Dr. Dodge is regarded as one of the greatest living authorities on Lincoln.

"I expect to show by documentary evidence that Lincoln's famous Gettysburg speech was not scratched on the back of an envelope while he was riding to that famous battlefield, but was one of his most carefully prepared speeches, and one upon which he worked about 10 days," Dr. Dodge said in announcing the course.

"The 'lost speech' supposed to have been delivered at Blomington, Ill., was not lost at all, as it was delivered the next day at Galena, Ill. Contemporary newspapers described in detail the meetings at which Lincoln spoke, but it was not then the custom of reporters, to attempt to quote the speeches, and hus it was natural ha no record of his remarks are found.

"Just as Washington's home paper called him 'an o ldfool' for signing the United Sttaes constitution, one Springfield paper ridiculed Lincoln's Gettysburg address, referring to his gestures 'as those of a clown'."

This point is brought out by Dr. Dodge to indicate that much of the idealism with which Lincoln is regarded today was absent while he was president, and added that 'criticism of President Wilson was very mild, compared with that which Lincoln met."
