"PEACE BY NEGOTIATION" DISCUSSED BY COL. SIMONDS, THE MILITARY CRITIC

(By Frank H. Simonds, written for The Halifax Herald.)

At the present time when the statesmen of the two warring groups are patiently negotiating at the long arm, on at least endeavoring to disclose to the hostile populations the basis on which they are ready to negotiate, it is well to keep clearly in mind the possible and the impossible in the matter of a negotiated peace. All the great European settlements after general wars have been negotiated peaces. The World War will unquestionably be terminated at some time by another great settlement like those of Westphalia, Utrecht and Vienna. In the first the question of religious freedom was settled; in the second the effort of Louis XIV. to dominate Europe was disposed of; and in the third the Napoleonic dream of European supremacy was abolished.

In all three cases, then, it will be seen that the principle for which Europe was fighting, that of European liberty, whether religious or political was asserted in a fashion which seems in accord with our contemporary notions of right and justice. Despite the fact that all three settlements were by negotiations, each of them was in the largest view a righteous settlement in the main issue. Now in the present war Europe and America, so far as the United States and Canada are concerned, are fighting to preserve European and world liberty, exactly as Europe fought in the time of Louis XIV and of Napoleon. The basis of negotiated peace, therefore, must this time be as it was before, it must be a discussion based upon the recognition by the enemy of certain essential principles, but these essential principles will, in turn, be expressed in certain material terms. What are these material terms and what moral principles do they express?

First of all there can be no negotiation will restore the doctrine of intertary with the recognition by Germany of the necessity of evacuating and indemnifying Belgium. Such a recognition will restore the doctrine of international law, invaded by German "necessity" when Belgium was invaded.

Secondly, there can be no negotiation with Germany which does not begin with the agreement on the part of Germany to evacuate Northern France and indemnify the people of the invaded district for all wanton injury, done in defiance of international law. Nor can there be any settlement which does not open with a demonstrated readiness on the German part to right "the wrong of 1871" which was expressed in the annexation of Alsace-Lorraine. Here we have a vindication of that portion of international law which covers the question of the conduct of war and a renunciation by the Germans of the doctrine of forcible annexation after successful war, and in defiance of the will of the population annexed.

Thirdly, there can be no negotiations with Germany, which do not open with an assertion on the part of Germany's ally, the will to recognize the principle of the right of small Nations existence and it will represent a renunciation of the German and Austrian ideas that small peoples have no right to live, when they are obstacles to the political or military ambitions of great Nations. And exactly the same thing applies to Rumania.

Fifthly, there can be no negotiated peace with Germany until the Germans openly announce all intentions to create out of Russian territories states which will be in fact mere tools and pawns of their own. There must be a really independent Poland, not the thing which the Germans and Austrians are now seeking to create which is a mere sham. There must be a restoration to Russia of her Baltic provinces without which there will be no economic freedom for the Russian millions. In this issue, once more is involved the question of forcible annexation after victory, as it was involved in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine after the Franco-Prussian war.

These same principles have an application in the case of the Arabians of Mesopotamia and Syria, in the case of the Armenians of Eastern Turkey. The civilized Nations of the world cannot consent to return the remnant of the Armenian people to their Turkish assassins, nor can they agree to prolong the misery of the people of Syria and of Mesopotamia by restoring Turkish rule.

Here, then are the bases of a negotiated peace. They are not the maximum or the minimum requirements of Nations seeking territorial gains, or other profits as the result of victory; they are the expressions of the moral principles for which the western world is at war and for which it must continue to fight until the German people accept them or the decision in the field re-establishes them. They are the principles expressed alike in the peace terms of Lloyd George, addressing the Labor congress and of President Wilson in his subsequent address to congress. We shall negotiate peace with Germany and her allies when these principles have been received by them; we cannot do it before that time, we cannot do it on any other basis save that of a complete surrender of all for which we have been fighting and the recognition of the supremacy of the Nation, not alone of the German Nation has adopted and employed, principles destructive of all western civilization stands for in the minds of the western Nations.

Despite much contemporary discussion there is no difference of opinion between the United States, British or France as to these essential principles and no real sentiment in favor of opening any negotiation for peace until these have been recognized by Germany. Such difference as exists is as to the present possibility of such recognition by Germany or by Austria, Britain, France and Italy at the Congress of Versailles. Mr. Wilson, in his second address to congress, expressed his own hope and that of a considerable element in Britain, that there was present hope if the truth could be brought home to the German and Austrian people, at least how far as Austria is concerned. But this does not represent any divergence on the vital question of the maintenance of all principles at stake, on that, all the allies are equally firm.

It may be possible to establish the principles for which we are fighting without a complete victory in the field, as was the case at Westphalia and at Utrecht. It may be necessary to achieve a complete military success first, as was the case before the Congress of Vienna. Mr. Wilson hopes that the former will prove possible. Lloyd George and Clemenceau believe that the latter is the case. But if Mr. Wilson proves mistaken, he will unquestionably be bound standing squarely with the other on the fact that no matter what the sacrifice the essential principles must be re-established and a military decision sought persistently until it is attained, if there is no other way to reach a righteous settlement.

SAD MYSTERY OF A FRENCH BATTLEFIELD

BELFAST, ME., Feb. 25.—In a grave, "Somewhere in France" marked "Unknown" lies a brave soldier, who, when dying, called the name of a Belfast girl and asked a comrade to write her and tell her of his death.

It was in March, 1916, while she was a student in the Belfast high school, that Miss Edna Curtis, daughter of the late Maurice Curtis, of this city, received a letter from France, signed J. S. Price, formerly of Millinocket. The writer stated that he was keeping a promise made to a dying comrade the year before, who with his last breath called her name and begged him to write to her. Miss Curtis had no idea who the dead soldier might be, for the writer was unable to give the name, and so the matter remained a mystery.

The young lady is now a student nurse in the Eastern Maine General hospital and about a week ago attended a patient from Millinocket. She told Miss Curtis about a young man recently returned home from France and the name was that signed to the letter received two years ago. On her return to Millinocket, the patient told the young man of meeting Miss Curtis, he wrote her and asked to be allowed to call on her to tell her of the dead comrade. This was done a few days ago, the wounded Millinocket boy, now honorably discharged from the Canadian contingent of the British expeditionary Forces going to Bangor.

He stated that one day in retreat after a hard battle, he passed a comrade fallen, wounded. Stopping, he knelt beside him and the dying lips spoke Miss Curtis' name, and said: "Write her at Belfast, Maine, and tell her I am dead." Mr. Price was obliged
