AMONG THE SCOTTISH SETTLERS

of 1820 were Duncan Currie and his parents. His selection of the burying ground was made on an occasion when he was in the forest looking for a cow which had strayed away from his small clearings. Coming to this open green space in the woods the inspiration came to him that he would like to be buried there. On going home he informed his young wife of his choice.

Shortly afterwards Currie went to the lumberwoods in Miramichi, N. B., only to return to the Island to recover from injuries he had received from a heavy hand spike. He died in Charlottetown, January 22, 1832, and his body was brought to Little Sands and buried in his chosen cemetery.

"For many years the cemetery was controlled by a few trustees. In 1915 an additional acre was bought and the cemetery was formed into the Little Sands Cemetery Company and incorporated by act of the provincial legislature. It is now controlled by a board of seven trustees elected annually. All the early settlers did not use this cemetery to bury their dead, but a very large number did and during the past one hundred years many found it their last resting place."

The thriftiness of the Island people of today is an inheritance from these Scottish pioneers. "The early Scotch settlers," the sketch continued, "were a most industrious people. All day they would clear the forest and work to raise a small crop. At night they would take their small boats, go out and set their nets a short distance from the shore to get herring. They would then go out further to sea to catch cod, hake and mackerel to provide food for their families. In this respect they were more fortunate than the early settlers who had settled inland. They were a most social and neighborly people, many are the stories told of the assistance they gave one another at their grain cutting frolics, and especially in their well known thickening frolics where men and women would gather at a home in the evening to prepare the home-spun cloth for clothing for the family."

"The women were real home makers. They manufactured all the clothing for the family, and with the flax they grew made sheets, towels and tablecloths."
