Bedtime Stories

way Buster had been tricked. Reddy Fox was there grinning broadly. It seemed to Buster as if every one in the Green Forest was there. It made him angrier than ever. Growling ugly threats at everybody he started down the tree backward, as is his way and the way of all members of the Cat family. Bobby Coon sometimes backs down a tree, but he can go down either way and usually goes down head first, as do all the Squirrel folk. They can see all the time what is below them while those who back down can't unless they stop now and then to look below.

Buster was almost far enough down to let go and drop the rest of the way when he stopped to look below to see where he would land. He didn't let go. No, sir, he didn't let go. Instead he hastily scrambled back up a little way. Some one was there right at the foot of the tree, some one in a black coat with white stripes and with a white cap nnd a big bushy tail.

"Look out down there if you don't want to be dropped on," growled Buster Bear, but he didn't come down any lower.

"I wouldn't do it if I were you. I really wouldn't. You'll be awfully sorry if you do," replied Jimmy Skunk mildly, for, of course, that is who was at the foot of the tree.

Buster Bear didn't. He even climbed a bit higher instead of lower. He was treed, and he knew it.

ing his interest for the time, was off with her to call the dogs to confinement. Three, we own to at present—Pard, the mother and her likeable black pup. And suspending our care of the moment we followed in the children's wake.

And so along damp fields above which mist was looped in soft gray folds this morning, the farmers herded their sheep to the barnyard. A corner of it held them. Complacent old ewes, alert comely young matrons, swaggering gallants of male lambs, and young sweet-faced things. "See this line" the younger farmer pointed out, he being much taken up with this study in farm animals, "here's one and there's another — they're always the thriftiest in the flock." James himself was gate-keeper but we were set to guard a suspected place of exit and the children watched eagerly from a top rail of the fence nearby. Wooly coats were damp from the night showers, and as the separating continued the lambs' bleatings echoed mournfully in the grey of the morning.

Tonight, the mill-stream lies between the flocks, but odd times one hears answering bleats borne to us indoors from the moonlight. And who is the fellow that is perched on an arm of James' chair, across from granddaughter, hearing from James' lips fascinating tales of the long ago? Why, Jamie, of course? "But there now," James says, "that's plenty for tonight, off to your beds now, and we'll have some more another time!" which returns us to duty.
