ART EXHIBIT OPENED IN HARRIS GALLERY

First of Series To Be Held Here Under Auspices of Art Society.

The first of a series of art exhibitions to be held in the Harris Memorial Art Gallery opened yesterday. The Art Society of Prince Edward Island which is affiliated with the Maritime Art Association is responsible for the arrangement. The pictures are paintings and water colors by outstanding artists of the French school and are especially interesting in that they form a link between the attitude of the present day and that of the past.

On the right of the gallery as the visitor enters, among the small unframed pictures is one called "The Spanish Singer." It was painted by Manet in 1860 and was received with commendation by the judges of the time. Visitors to the Harris Memorial Gallery may see now and during the next few days pictures of great interest, in that they form a link between the attitude of the present day and that of past attitudes of mind or cultures.

Further along the wall is another by the same artist called "The Picnic." In this picture Manet came into the scene of the Venetian painters in the 15th century and he uses a similar kind of subject matter. The picture on view is only an unfinished sketch for what was a large painting in oils, but the interesting part is that in this picture Manet attempted and succeeded in painting human flesh in the same composition as he painted the glories of nature. He had a new theory of lighting, which won for him the name "Father of modern luminism."

Manet and his followers became known as Impressionists from the fact that they based their setting of a scene on the instantaneous vision rather than seeing a nature scene in small sections.

They also made use of the new color theories discovered by scientists about this time. "The Poppy Field" and "Bridges at Argenteuil" are examples of this manner of painting. The other paintings are by Renoir, also a follower of Manet. He accepted the luminist vision of light and color but rejected a certain casualness of drawing which was creeping in.

In the centre of the adjoining wall is a large picture in pastels by Degas, "The Dancers." It was a study of the extreme Impressionist Degas adopted the coloring of the luminists. From a study of Japanese art he became skillful in finding odd and unexpected arrangements. He liked to paint ballet dancers and bathers. To the left of "The Dancers" are five pictures by "Paul Cezanne." Cezanne, whose influence on modern art has been great, exhibited with the Impressionists. Already a reaction had set in and he was not one of them, and whereas the Impressionists painted light at the sacrifice of form and structure the essential thing.

Van Gogh, whose pictures come next, also took part in the reaction against "Impressionism" and at the same time he was fumbling for a better method of expression. Van Gogh was a mad-man, a failure in other walks of life but such pictures as he painted before the tragic end of his life were filled with lyrical expression, dashed on canvas with broad strokes and pure color. His lines give a vivid sense of motion but are often violently distorted. Gauguin, whose one example hangs in the corner, was a rebel against civilization as he saw it. He painted the South Sea Islands and the picture on view, "Arearea," is the result of one of these trips.

Next to Gauguin on the wall is a little picture by the Englishman Augustus John, who is still living and exhibiting in many of the galleries in Great Britain. He studied for a time in Paris and felt the influence of the artists under discussion. He also distorts when he wishes for the sake of emotional creation and then paints enough in the spirit of modern French artists to exhibit with them.

ADDRESS ON ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Delivered by W. Maynard Shaw At Central School Fair.

The following address on Abraham Lincoln was delivered at the recent Oratorical Contest for school children at the Central School Fair, Charlottetown. There were over thirty contestants in the competition, representing all parts of the Province. Master W. Maynard Shaw, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, won the competition with this fine paper on one of the world's notable characters.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

On the morning of February 12th, 1809, the hushed stillness of a cabin on Nolin Creek, in the highlands of Kentucky, was broken by the cry of an infant, whose voice in later years saved thousands of his fellow countrymen, and whose personality and ability exercised a tremendous influence on the destiny of the United States. Abraham Lincoln was ushered into life amid scenes of undistinguishable poverty. His first home was a crude hut, open to the elements, and without windows, doors or a floor. Under such primitive conditions, it is remarkable that the baby survived, but a kind Providence endowed the child with a rugged constitution, and ultimately brought him forth as the emancipator of the American Negro, and one of the greatest characters of history.

The annals of all nations are illuminated with figures of extraordinary attainments but Lincoln looks beyond national boundaries—a distinct world possession, a man dominant over his environment, and eternally ennobled with the qualities of truth, honor and humanity.

The parents of Abraham Lincoln had few of the qualities which characterized their distinguished son. The father, Thomas Lincoln, was a carpenter by trade, shiftless, illiterate, and inclined to wander. The mother, Nancy Hanks, was a frail, sweet, sensitive woman, of humble birth, and with a feeble education. Privations and discouragements finally exacted their toll, and when Abraham was nine years old, the weary mother was laid to rest beneath the trees of an Indiana homestead. It is stated that the boy, naturally a reverent nature, induced an itinerant clergyman, who came that way nine months later, to repeat the funeral services over the lonely grave.

Lincoln's tender years were filled with extreme hardship, but the rugged, homely youth never complained but applied himself diligently to varied tasks on river, farm and woods. At the same time, he availed himself of every opportunity to improve his mind. Schools were ordinary, books and paper were few, but naturally he became a voracious reader. It is interesting to note that Lincoln carefully studied the Bible, and his subsequent simplicity of life and style reveals the influence of the Book of Books. On his way to and from work, in the moments of meal time, in the flickering fireside or candle light, Lincoln applied himself to the task of mental development. Under such conditions his education was imperfect. Nevertheless his study and experience moulded his mind for the responsibilities he was later to assume. In witty and forceful expression, Lincoln excelled. He watched the proceedings in the County Courts, the style of the visiting clergymen, and finally, through wise study and imitation, the rugged country boy became famous for his wit and satire and the power and measured judgment of his address. Slowly but surely, against stupendous odds, Lincoln conquered the handicaps with which he was surrounded and emerged into the broad highway of the nation's recognition. In 1834, he entered the Illinois Legislature. During this period he served in a store, split rails, enlisted in the Black Hawk war, became a Postmaster and went to the State Bar to add to his slender income. In the intervals he took up the study of law and was admitted to the Bar in 1837. His reputation as a lawyer of high repute and undoubted integrity became an established fact. From this time on his advance was rapid. In 1846, he entered Congress and finally in 1860 became President of the United States. During his term of office the County was torn by the Civil War, in which over 500,000 men lost their lives. Lincoln's greatness looms up through the struggle. Although his heart bled with the horror of it all, his firm belief in the freedom of the slaves sustained him through deep waters. On April 14th, 1865, while attending a theatre performance, he was wantonly assassinated. The terrible tragedy sobered a storm-tossed people. Hatreds were eased, differences were mended, North and South mourned the loss of a man who loved friend and foe alike. Lincoln's humanity, his spirit of conciliation and forgiveness are exemplified in his public utterances. One of his great statements made previous to his death, illustrates the grandeur of his nature—"With

FUNERAL OF LATE MISS LONG—The funeral of the late Miss Emily Long was held from her late residence on Euston Street yesterday. The service at the house was conducted by Major Stevens and Rev. Hugh Miller. Interment was in Winslow Cemetery where the service was conducted by Major Stevens. The pall bearers were Messrs. Ross Bethune, George Pearson, Dr. J. H. Ayers, Arthur King, Fred Chandler, and Ernest Duchemin.

malice toward none, with charity toward all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations."

Lincoln does not belong to the United States. He belongs to the world, coming up out of its obscurity and remaining in its history as one of the greatest characters of all time. He came as with a Divine benediction and like the Master of Men look upon himself the burden of others and sacrificed his life for them. What a remarkable example his life is! We see him there, a crude, uncouth country boy, in a poverty stricken cabin in the Kentucky wilderness. We see him toiling upward and onward in an environment by the sheer force of his character, worshipping honor, morally and truth with the devotion of a Moslem. We see him on the nation's highway until that proud yet serious day when he ascends the steps of the White House and receives the highest gift that his country can bestow—the Presidency of the United States.

We see the gaunt form, the sad, tired kindly face, throughout his great struggle for the freedom of his slaves. We feel his magnetic personality, as we see faces light with the magic of his eloquence at the Gettysburg Memorial as he dedicates himself anew, in a background of death, misery and hatred, to the service of his country, and reaffirms anew, almighty and true, the principle that all men are born equal. We see him, there, the lips stilled forever, the serenity of death on his noble countenance, the tired hands folded and at rest, as thousands of his countrymen, black and white, north and south, solemnly file past his bier, and through tear-dimmed eyes catch a last glimpse of a beloved personality. The Great Liberator has himself been freed from life's bondage.

Some of our most exquisite blooms are found in the shadows. In the shadows of poverty Lincoln was born. In the shadows of a great nation's tragedies, the Divine Creator brought him forth, one of humanity's most beautiful productions. From the shadows Lincoln brought the flower of freedom to four million enslaved people. From the shadows of his death sprang a United Nation dominated by the fragrance of his great personality and inspired through successive generations by his lofty example and full devotion. Yes, his life is an inspiration and a guide. Monarchs in all the pride of their power and lineage may learn from him that honour, greatness and immortality lie not in the arms of might but in the faithful service of the common people, while the peasant and labourer may learn that honesty, integrity and industry may surmount all barriers to the highest position in the state and the warmest niche in the hearts of a people.
