London Letter

LONDON, Aug. 6.—When a well known peer's affairs were investigated in the Bankruptcy Court recently, there was disclosed the fact that in one evening he had lost at chemin de fer, nearly ten thousand dollars. Contemporaneous there is in a Sunday paper an excerpt from the memoirs of the Earl of Rosslyn, who, a generation ago, was much in the public eye as a devotee of the card table.

I recall vividly an occasion when, at a card table in a well-known club, Lord Rosslyn had made a bid to retrieve his fortunes which at that time had been badly hit. He rose from the sitting the poorer by a very large sum indeed. I was present the following day when he smilingly paid the money, running into many thousands of dollars without a sign of what it meant to him, though he knew that the loss had imperiled his fortune.

But, generally speaking, the days when fortunes were won and lost on the turn of the cards are past. Indeed, at the Cocoa Tree Club in London, whose rooms go back to the 18th century, there is preserved in a walnut wood case in the lounge a set of chips of blue enamel, the gaming values of which run from five to five thousand guineas, that is to say—from $25 to $25,000 or so!

Major Segrave, the famous racing motorist who broke the world's speed record in Florida not long ago, failed to live up to his reputation the other day—at least in the eyes of a London policeman. He was driving in the neighbourhood of Piccadilly when he was caught in a queue of cars held up by the traffic officer. The officer gave the 'all clear' signal and the Major began to surge forward, but the clutch of Major Segrave's car was sticky. Eventually he took off as the policeman good humouredly remarked: "Hurry up, Slow Coach."

The man who had done 207 miles an hour must have appreciated the humor of the situation.

For some time past the House of Commons has been comparatively placid and polite. Now Miss Helen Wilkinson, the popular woman Labour M. P., has done her best to wake it up to a sense of the possibilities of the English language. Her best effort was when she described Sir Douglas Hogg, the Attorney General, as 'having the face of Mr. Pickwick or a Cherry-blo cherub and the mind and heart of a Mephistopheles.'

The cherubic countenance of the Attorney General, which conceals a not inconsiderable amount of guile, is proverbial, but the diabolic qualities which Miss Wilkinson detects had not hitherto been noticed.

The Sphinxes of Cleopatra's Needle on the Thames Embankment are being cleaned to remove the corrosion which the London atmosphere causes. The humor of the situation is that the workmen brush vigorously with stiff hard brushes, but use no soap or water. Thousands of people who pass the needle daily at this time of year, quite a large proportion of whom are from overseas, comment on the apparently dilapidated state of these images. Chips and long scars mar the Sphinxes in every direction, and even the pavement adjoining is cut into little inch-deep channels. Passers-by, however, do not realize that these scars are souvenirs of the Great War; they are the wounds left by the bombs which our Teutonic visitors amiably dropped upon us, and as such are left unrepaired "lest we forget."

It will puzzle the historian of this age, when he comes to investigate it centuries hence, to explain how, in a period of baneful trade, of depressed industry and continual protests against the cost of living and high taxes, the English people should be able to afford a sum approaching $200,000 for seats for the Milligan-Walker fight.

There is always a lack of the sense of proportion on these occasions. An amusing instance of this is the remark of the promoter of the fight. Speaking before the event, he said: "the name of Tommy Milligan is greater in Scotland today than either Bobbie Burns or Sir Walter Scott. This is nonsense. The name of Lindbergh is deservedly famous in his own country, but one would not assert that it transcends those of Washington or Lincoln.

The Scottish people is not so unstable as that.

An unusual exhibition has just been held in London for a few days. It was that of the "Drawers of Golde and Sylver Wyre," one of the oldest crafts of the City of London.

Apparently little change has taken place in the methods of the handicraftsmen for many centuries. Old wooden looms, reminiscent of the earliest days of weaving, are still in use, although in a few instances they are driven by electric power.

But the spirit of modernity will creep in, and the President of the Board of Trade, Sir Philip Cunliffe Lister, found it not inappropriate to quote a quatrain running as follows—

"He who whispers down a well Of the goods he has to sell Will never reap as many dollars As he who climbs a tree and hollers."
