Discuss Britain's Food Problems in Wartime

"Food and the War" was the subject of an interesting address yesterday by Professor J. A. Scott, Watson, Agricultural Attaché at the British Embassy at Washington, and Agricultural Adviser to the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Canada. Prof. Watson spoke at the noon luncheon of the Rotary Club.

He pointed out that all the great food exporting countries are either fighting the Axis or are willing to supply the allies with food—Canada, United States, Australia, New Zealand and Argentina have all large food reserves. The difficulty is to move these resources. There is indeed a large shipbuilding program, but there have also of late, been heavy sinkings. The only way of adding immediately to munitions and military transports is to make shifts with less shipping tonnage for food.

The speaker pointed out four chief ways of achieving this essential economy of shipping. The first is to reduce food consumption in Britain to the barest amount necessary to maintain health and morale; the second is to boost food production in Britain to the highest practicable level; third, to fill the gap in Britain's food supply from Canada, the United States and West Africa, and, fourth, to reduce the weight and bulk of those foods which must be imported. He dealt in detail with each of these methods, dealing first with the British food rationing system, which has succeeded so well in meeting nutritional needs, that the national health is doing better than it was in normal times of peace. This, he explained, is the result not only of the care taken to provide a balanced ration, but to a nationwide campaign in the choice, preparation and economy of food, to the provision of free and cheap meals for children of the poorer classes, the provision of carefully planned meals for workers, and to the reduction in consumption of sugar and sweet stuffs.

KEEP THE WHEELS TURNING

Farm Management A higher degree of efficiency in farm management is also being achieved by better cultivation, more scientific use of fertilizers and feeds, the making of surplus grass into silage, etc. All farms are grouped by County War Committees into three categories. The County Committees also, where necessary, give financial help for the purchase of fertilizers and equipment and lend equipment for tillage and harvest operations.

An important factor has been the concentration of effort on those products which are of greatest value as human food. Prof. Watson said. First priority crops are potatoes, wheat and other grains, sugar beet and the common vegetables and legumes. A quota system is in operation for each crop; each farmer receiving a quota as to the amount that he must grow.

As regards livestock, priority is given to dairy herds. As a result, piglets and lambs are scarce, but by about 85 per cent, vegetable production by over 50 per cent and sugar beet by 18 per cent, which represents the limit of factory capacity.
