JUST A GIRL

BY JANE PHELPS

A BIRTHDAY PARTY

CHAPTER 6.

I almost hated all our society conventions before I went home that night. Mother always sent her maid after me in the car. Just as the party was breaking up, Kenneth Lawrence said:

"May I take you home, or have you other arrangements?" "Thank you, but Mother's maid will call for me. I had felt a little out of things all the evening. Of course Kenneth could not sit out all the dances with me, and after talking to him the boys like Jack Pryor and Gregory Stuart seemed awfully pale and uninteresting."

"You Mother is a very wise lady," he said with a smile. Then, more seriously, "She is right, too, in a place like New York one needs to be careful."

How I wished Mother weren't quite so careful when I saw him leave with Edith Wren. Not that her mother wasn't careful, too, but she was so intimate with Claudia, I suppose her mother thought they would attend to her getting home. Afterward I heard she had intended to remain all night, but that when Kenneth offered to take her home in Claudia's new car, she couldn't resist going.

Dad occasionally talked to me about my "beaux" as he called the young men in my set, not as Mother talked of their wealth, their manners, their suitability as husbands, but of the most themselves, what they were. Then he would tell me his idea of what a true man was. He cautioned me to look beneath the superficial outside, to learn to discriminate between real value and veneer.

"Take time, daughter, to know a man. Don't make the fatal mistake of marrying someone of whom you know nothing. I'm in no hurry to be rid of my little girl."

"I heard Mother and Mrs. Wren talking one day. It was a long time ago. They were speaking of some girl who had been 'out' two seasons, and was still single. They spoke as if it were some sort of a disgrace, as if that girl was a failure."

"Perhaps you did not quite understand your Mother, dear. But suppose Mrs. Grundy does say such things, and people like her repeat them. Old Dame Grundy hasn't any conscience, you know. She loves a gossip on people—they give her something to talk about."

I knew Father hated to have Mother try to get me married, but he never allowed me to criticize her, and he loved her very dearly. While they were both persons of strong opinions, I never heard them quarrel or say an unkind word to each other.

had worn in school. One never knew when one might meet another who loved a long tramp! I didn't think it wrong not to tell Mother. I was very careful never to again sit on a bench in the park, or to stay around where any of her friends would see us.

Kenneth was going home, back to California, the day after my birthday. I told him that night how sorry I was to have him go, and he made me the queerest answer: "It is time I went. I might say things I have no right to say to a girl like you."

I wondered what he meant, but I was so busy playing hostess that of course I couldn't meet my other friends. I did talk to him quite a little, I noticed. I'd get him to tell me what they had talked about.

Dad gave me a lovely pearl necklace, small pearls, but so well matched; and Mother gave me a lovely wrist watch, set in tiny diamonds and platinum. The favors were perfectly lovely, and everyone said they had a wonderful time when they left at 2 o'clock. That was Dad's limit for me, 2 o'clock, and even then I had to remain in bed until noon the next day.

Kenneth came in to say goodbye to me. I think I rather disgraced myself. I know Mother was shocked.
