THE BIJOU APARTMENT

The Paris representative of the new York lawyers was in charge of the late Henry Hartley's estate, proved a charming person and immediately took Doris under his wing.

He did not ask her embarrassing questions about where she had been on these months and why she had not communicated with her cousin prior to his death. He arranged her financial affairs for her expertly, and then, assuming the professional, took a personal interest in his pretty client.

Through his kind offices, she secured a charming, little apartment, elegantly furnished, opposite the Luxembourg Gardens—a tiny place, but one provided with the amenities as she insisted. It was only a step through one of the gigantic gateways into that jolly, green maze which surrounds the old Luxembourg Palace.

The lawyer insisted that Doris should not live alone and he provided her with a charming little French woman who served as her companion, hair maid. She seemed to have endless relatives in and around Paris to visit in her leisure hours, so her presence was never irksome to Doris.

There was the problem of a voice teacher and the lawyer solved it in the twinkling of an eye, and almost before she knew it, Doris was settled in Paris, and found herself going to and fro through its lovely streets and boulevards, a music case tucked under her arm, quite as if she had never done anything else in all her life.

The lawyer—Mr. Harper was his name—then undertook to provide her with suitable social life. For a time—a very brief time—he was the only caller in the little drawing room overlooking the Luxembourg Gardens. But, as Doris herself had said, she made friends easily and soon she had another little group of pleasant people around her. But not wealthy, idle, very fashionable people like the Riviera crowd. Her new acquaintances were mainly students like herself, with a sprinkling of writers, artists, musicians who had already "arrived."

She went to gay, little Bohemian suppers at studios in the Latin Quarter. She had glimpses of the cafes frequented by students in the Montmartre district. She attended concerts—difficultly it must be admitted—and went to art exhibitions.

Her adaptability amazed even herself.

She speedily forgot the idle days of play on the lovely Riviera. She forgot Hartley's family, Camilla and the life in New York. But she remembered Drayburn, Iowa, and when finally she wrote to her Aunt Elsie, she received a reply which contained no reference to her rather vague explanations of her long silence, but urged her to study hard and become worthy of her late cousin's legacy and trust.

As for Hartley himself, he was having a time of it!

When Doris had walked away and left him with such a brief goodbye that day in the cafe, he had been so furious with her that he had flung away in the opposite direction declaring that he hoped he'd never see her again, and left him gaping like a fool! She'd actually dismissed him, just as it he were a tiresome lackey that she'd had to put up with until she could better herself!

He was violently angry for all of twenty-four hours. The second day he shrugged and told himself that he was to be congratulated, at last he'd got rid of the little pest who'd been a bar to his freedom. She could go and jump off the Eiffel Tower, or get run over by a Paris taxicab for all he cared.

On the third day, he decided that while he didn't give a darn, he supposed it was only decent to see that nothing terrible happened to the little idiot. She was stupid enough to get into any sort of a mess.

So he wrote a letter to her and addressed it to the American Embassy. When no answer came, he wrote another—and another. Dropping around to the offices one day with an inquiry, he found that the letters remained uncalled for.

He was baffled for the long time. If he didn't get the largest city in the world, it's still extensive and bewildering enough not to be able to place your finger on a girl who has deliberately lost herself. He tried sitting in front of the Café de la Paix at five o'clock on the theory that if you stay there long enough, the person you desire to see will pass.

After a few days he gave it up and, dismaying as the prospect was, he set out to interview the lawyers who handled Doris' affairs.

MISSIONARIES FREED

(Special to the Guardian)

LONDON, Dec. 18.—The Baptist Missionary Society today received word for much of our live stock, the chief source of succulent winter food for much of the population of the Maritime Provinces. While the excellence of roots for this purpose cannot be denied, it must be noted that the cost of production of dry matter in roots is very high. With hired help expensive and difficult to obtain, the cost of silage of $6.09, in corn 3 tons, and in sunflowers at a cost of $4.29. Such figures merit consideration, and in themselves would seem strongly to recommend the raising of silage where stock raising or mixed farming is practiced.

With respect to yield, the Bulletin "Silage and Silo Construction for the Maritime Provinces," prepared by the Superintendent Station, Charlottetown, P. E. Island, contains data on the average yield of a silo per acre of corn at various eastern stations, ranging from ten to thirty-one tons per acre, and the highest 21 tons per acre, with a means of approximately 14 tons per acre per year for four stations. Sunflowers will usually run somewhat higher in tonnage per acre than corn, while oats and peas are reported at from 4 to 8 tons.

The same publication also contains data on the cost of erecting a wood-stave silo having a capacity of about 50 tons. Staves for this silo were clear spruce and threaded at a local machine shop. The cost, including cement foundation, lumber, hardware and all labor charges, amounted to only $260.00. It is further noted that the cash outlay to a farmer having his own lumber and labour available, should not exceed $100.00.

PARIS GOSSIP VENDERS BAND FOR PROTECTION

PARIS, Dec. 18.—Writers of the short, sparkling and often indiscreet articles that have a wide vogue in Paris newspapers under the caption "Echos", have formed an association for their mutual benefit.

Just what the benefit will be is left open to doubt, but some commentators have pointed out that numerous duels have resulted from these anonymous paragraphs while often irate readers who considered their dignity or reputation hurt have gone gunning for the writers. Nevertheless, the "echo" continues one of the greatest sources of newspaper joys to French readers.
