Interpreting The War

By Kirke L. Simpson Associated Press Staff Writer

British occupation of the Mosul region in Iraq is an important element in the war news. Barring damage to the oil fields by hostile

Iraq or by retiring Nazi units, the move presumably assures adequate fuel stocks for British planes and mechanized forces if the war is to spread actively to French-mandated Syria.

The Egyptian cabinet upset, an outgrowth of fears that an Axis invasion of the Nile Delta from the east is impending, suggests that a British-French crisis is not far off, with Syria as the battle ground and Egypt as Britain's active ally.

Whatever other British preparations to meet a new emergency in Syria may be under way, British control of Mosul oil sources was the first essential. The issue of a conflict in Syria will likely turn on oil resources.

British bombing of French oil depots at Beirut, Syria, bears out that view. It is assumed that stocks of gasoline and oil in Syria, long cut off from renewal via the Mosul-Syrian pipeline, are low.

Presumably they have been still further reduced by the refueling of German planes enroute to Iraq. German planes estimated to number from 100 up have been reported in Iraq. They played no important part in the British-Iraq conflict now ended with a British-supported government restored at Baghdad. It is assumed that they have fallen back into French territory.

In any event, British seizure and retention of the Mosul oil centre and prompt action to ground French or German planes and immobilize mechanized forces in Syria for lack of fuel indicates that no time is being lost to capitalize on the victory in Iraq. Whatever may be the effect on British-French relations, the Churchill Ministry has moved swiftly to take advantage of an aspect of the situation highly favorable to Britain.

Bomb Victim Describes His 'Luck' And Gratitude to Fund

An extraordinary escape from a direct hit on an air raid shelter is described in a letter to the Queen's Canadian Fund for Air Raid Victims from a man in Southampton, England. He expresses gratitude for a gift of money "just at the time it was needed" from the Lord Mayor's National Air Raid Distress Fund, through which the Queen's Fund operates in Great Britain. Here is the letter:

Dear Sir—I had experienced some very bad raids in Southampton but always seemed to bear a lucky star and somehow come through it unscathed. I was walking along a particular road last summer during an alert, when a German machine dived out of the clouds and began to machine-gun the road. I immediately fell down alongside of the wall and I am still wondering how those bullets missed me. About two minutes after I heard the screaming of bombs, and looking up from where I was lying saw a huge amount of debris fly through the air. A large bomb had scored a direct hit on a hotel. These scenes after a while became quite common and after a while we seemed to get more used to them. As the months went on I began to think that I was really born under a lucky star for I had dozens of lucky escapes from injury.

Well, on Nov. 23rd, 1940 there was a particularly heavy Blitz. I might add it was a night Blitz, and I took my mother to a shelter. We had not been in there very long before a large bomb fell and landed no more than 30 feet from where we were. I immediately came out of the shelter to see if my house was very much damaged and found that it was almost in ruins, but the funny part was that my canary was still hanging on the bare wall standing, and was just as lively as ever.

WITHOUT A HOME

There were a few casualties caused by this one bomb, as I helped to get some of the injured to shelter pending the arrival of the ambulance. That was a very bad night for us, as of course the following day we were without a home.

Well, the only thing to do now was to find another house if possible.

In the meantime we had to take refuge at the Central Hall, a large building being used for the purpose of helping the air raid victims. In our search for another house we were rather fortunate and began to move in on Nov. 30th. All that day I worked like a Trojan salvaging what I could from the ruins of my old home and transferring it to the new.

When it became too dark to do any more I decided to go and have a drink at the pub that I always used five hundred yards away, but I had hardly begun to walk there when away goes the alert for another raid. I did not take a lot of notice until the guns started to send up a rather heavy barrage and old Jerry dropped his flares, so I decided to take shelter for a while and have my beer after things had quieted a bit, but I never had that pint that night.

I was sitting there talking to a couple of soldiers who by the way were lying full length on the bench. Outside it seemed like hell was let loose. Bombs were dropping all around us but my luck still seemed to hold good. I had a bit of food in my pocket and was just thinking of having a bite, when I heard a bomb coming that seemed louder than the rest.

"No Angels" From Toronto

OTTAWA, June 3—(CP)—Prime Minister Mackenzie King used a retort made by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier when, in the House of Commons today, T. L. Church (Ontario-Broadview) asked him to consider giving Toronto direct representation in the Dominion Cabinet.

Mr. King said that when an Ontario delegation made similar representation to Sir Wilfrid the latter replied—"you good people of Ontario want me to have a cabinet of angels but you don't send me angels to make a cabinet of."
