As I like It

Excerpts from Scribner's Magazine (August and September '24) (William Lyon Phelps)

A list of leading story-writers drawn up in any decade of the 19th century would have shown an overwhelming preponderance of men. How about such a list today? What group of men have produced within the last few months novels equal in merit to "So Big," by Edna Ferber; the four books of New York by Edith Wharton; "The Home-maker," by Dorothy Canfield; "Paint Perfume," by Zona Gale; "The Lost Lady," by Willa Cather; "Lumox," by Fannie Hurst; "Jennifer Lorn," by Elinor Wylie? When the house of Harpers recently offered a prize for the best new novel, it was awarded to Margaret Wilson for "The Able McLaughlins" in every sense of the word, women are looking up.

Poetical and musical compositions show perhaps more creative power than prose fiction. Some day the world may see a first-class woman poet and a first-class composer. There are of course many who regard Elizabeth Barrett Browning and Christina Rossetti as in the front rank of poets; but there are more who do not. No where and at no time on the earth has there appeared a woman among the great makers of music. This is at first sight all the more remarkable because it is probable that there are a hundred women to one man who understand and appreciate the best music. The fact is, how ever that poetry and music are pre-eminently the manly arts; there are more first-class woman athletes than first-class woman poets and composers. Must this always be so? . . .

FOX SALES.—In the recent London fox sales conducted by Lampson Company the Park Island Silver Black Fox Company, R. C. Holman, manager, received the second highest price out of some 2,400 skins offered for sale and beaten out of first place by two pounds. The Park Island Company of Summerside is the first fox ranching stock company ever formed in North America and the record shows that it is keeping the quality up.

CLARKE'S WINDOW.—The large and well designed show windows in the pretentious store of Messrs. Sinclair and Stewart, Ltd., Summerside lend themselves admirably to beautiful decoration. This fact has been taken advantage of by the store's decorator, Mr. George Gorrill, who with a touch of genius all his own, has proved a richly impressive background of pure white which when imprinted with the words "Merry Xmas" woven in red and further enhanced by holly wreaths and tinsel, makes a very striking window display. The very simplicity of the color scheme makes it beautiful more than anything else, and the absence of excessive ornament gives the onlooker a clear view of the dainty or luxurious gifts shown in the spacious windows. The display is so well arranged that the effect is quite as good from a distance as at close range. It portrays something unique and original in window dressing and is well worth one's while viewing. Mr. Gorrill has also worked out a splendid color scheme in the decoration of the interior of Sinclair's commodious and bright store, which presents the innumerable gifts suggestion in a most attractive way.

He is an experienced newspaperman, capable of giving advertising counsel and service, etc., and will be pleased to receive news, subscriptions or advertising.

1000 FOXES.—Close on 1000 Silver Black Foxes were shipped from Summerside to the United States last month alone. So many foxes have gone out from Summerside this season it is almost impossible to get an accurate total of the gross number. However, some idea may be gained from the information that 1700 fox boxes (which are built to contain 2 foxes each) were sold locally by The Hall Manufacturing Co. and M. F. Schurman & Co., Summerside. Summerside and foxes have become synonymous terms to the world.

THEY DIDN'T MATCH

Glady's father raised chickens, and Gladys understood all about setting hens. One day she was taken to see the new litter of puppies. They were curly black balls cuddled down beside a smooth tan mother.

Are those really our Fanny's puppies? Gladys asked.

"Yes, dear," she was told.

"Well, then," she remarked in a disgusted tone, "she couldn't have set on her own eggs."

"Would you say 'Yes' if I asked you to marry me?" She (still more cautiously): "I should say 'Yes' if you would ask me to marry you." "I would say 'Yes' if you asked me to marry you?"

Sirdar's Assassination Was a Senseless Act

Russian, German, Egyptian and English patriots and public men must shoulder among them the final responsibility for the assassination in the streets of Cairo of Sir Lee Stack, the Sirdar. Only the Egyptian Government has been ordered to apologize and pay an indemnity, because its responsibility appears to be the clearest. Nevertheless, if there had not been active German agents at work in Egypt before the war; if there had not been Bolshevik emissaries busy after the Treaty of Versailles was signed, and if there had not been English politicians who aroused hopes in Egypt that could not be realized there would have been no assassination, Zaghoul Pasha has expressed his own horror and regret at what has happened, but Zaghoul is not without his own share of blame. He is a politician as well as a patriot, and for his own ends fanned the dangerous fires of nationalism. He was considered a dangerous agitator by the British Government and was expelled from Egypt in the fear that as a result of his teachings some such tragedy might happen as has now occurred.

to Egypt for half a century. If not for all time. After this plain-spoken warning there was an improvement, and political difficulties at home turned the attention of the British Government from Egypt. But in the MacDonald regime there was a reversal to the former unhappy state.

Owed to Lord Cromer.

Zaghoul Pasha himself owes his whole political career to the favor of the British. He was picked out by Lord Cromer for advancement and was made Minister of Justice. He was trusted by the British authorities, and it is said by Frederick Cunliffe Owen, C.B.E., that he even owed his brilliant marriage to the daughter and heiress of the late Mustapha Pasha Fehmi to the kind interest of Lord Cromer. But Zaghoul decided that there was more distinction for him if he took up the cause of the Nationalists. This he did with a vengeance, showing a particular venom against the British. In 1919 it was found necessary to exile him from the country. He was sent first to Malta, then to the Seychelles Islands and finally to Gibraltar. This, of course, made him a martyr, but did not teach him restraint, for when the British finally permitted him to return to Egypt he renewed his campaign with greater ardor than ever. It was not long before he realized the difficulty of his position for when on a couple of occasions he seemed to show some reasonableness to the British side of the case his life was attempted by fanatics.

Foreign Plotters.

Before the war, the Nationalist cause was greatly strengthened by the activities in Cairo of the Baron Max Oppenheim, who was attached to the German Embassy there. Under the pretext of Oriental studies and researches he got into touch with various discontented Egyptians and made it plain to them that Germany had the utmost sympathy for their independence yearnings. He did a good deal to build up the Nationalist party, but was expelled from the country on the outbreak of war. While the war was on British surveillance of Egypt was so strict that there was little opportunity for the Nationalists to become active, but when it was over Bolshevik agents were sent to the country. These agents, at first the enemies of the British rule soon had to find another objective for Britain granted Egypt virtual independence. Since then it is assumed that the Bolsheviks have issued their propaganda against the Egyptian Government and for all we know may have directly inspired the assassination of the Sirdar.

Protected by Britain.

Mr. Cunliffe Owen says:—"While denying to England any rights or privileges superior to those of any other foreign power, the Egyptian Government still relies upon her for defence against foreign aggression. If, for instance, Italy fulfilled her threat of last Summer to seize the Egyptian port of Sollum, 300 miles west of Alexandria, in order to prevent its being used by her Senoussi adversaries south of Tripoli as a means of obtaining war supplies from Europe, it would be to England that King Fuad's Government would be obliged to appeal for protection. For when Great Britain granted to the Egyptians, not as a right but as a gift, provisional national independence in place of the previous status of the entire world that she undertook the defence of Egypt against all foreign aggression, and that she would regard as an unfriendly act (involving war) an attempt at interference in the affairs of Egypt by another power, and as an act to be repelled by all the means at her command. She likewise accepted the full responsibility for the protection of all foreign interests and minorities and of all foreign life and property in Egypt. And yet the events of the past two or three years have shown pretty clearly that largely owing to political conditions in England her Government has been unsuccessful in its endeavors to protect the lives and interests of even her own subjects in the land of the Nile, let alone those of the subjects of other foreign powers."
