ZORA The Invisible

By J. R. WILMOT

"What reasons have you for thinking contrary to medical evidence?" She flashed the question at him with cold eyes.

"I did not come down with the intention of discussing that aspect of the case at all," Blayne told her, quietly.

"And how should I know that? Father was not in the habit of introducing us to all his acquaintances."

Sonia Gaynor, Blayne noted, was unquestionably clever. Her features were well under her control. But Blayne was much too experienced in his art to be deluded on that count.

"I can quite understand that," Blayne pursued his inquiry levelly. "I thought that perhaps you might at some time or other have heard Mr. Gaynor mention a young gentleman who certainly appears to have been on a footing of familiarity. As, however, you cannot help me, I must leave it at that. Perhaps Mrs. Gaynor may have some recollection?"

"I'm afraid mother's not well enough to see anyone else today," she was quick to reply.

"Scotland Yard is not at all sure about that," he said slowly. "That is why we should like to give him the opportunity of clearing himself—if he could."

"There is some doubt, then?" He nodded.

"Mr. Blayne, do you really think that this unknown person is a murderer?" Blayne was not altogether surprised at her question.

"Candidly—no! But I'm only speaking for myself, remember, Inspector Webster has other theories."

As Peter Blayne tramped back to the station there were several things perplexing him. Why had Sonia Gaynor taken such pains to prevent his interviewing her mother? And how much did she know about the young man who visited her father on the afternoon of the murder? That was the main problem, and it disturbed him. He tried hard to detach her from any complicity in the crime, and yet—a haunting doubt troubled him.

CHAPTER IX THE ATTACK ON THE ROAD

Peter Blayne walked briskly in the direction of the little, unobtrusive railway station at Oaktree after his verbal battle with Sonia Gaynor in the summerhouse, and though he felt that he had excited her suspicion against him—and he was not at all sure that that was what he wanted to do—he realised that Sonia was no fool. She had probably inherited from her father a good measure of that subtlety without which fortunes, even in diamonds, cannot be made to the same extent as Montgomery Gaynor's had been. He felt, too, that Sonia as an ally would be an extremely useful person, but Sonia on the other side of the fence might do incalculable harm to whatever plans he might have to lay in the near future.

Why, he thought, should she have taken such pains to attempt to discredit his theories as to the actual cause of her father's death? It seemed to Blayne that the girl actually wanted to believe that Montgomery Gaynor died in the same natural fashion as most other good citizens do, even though a few hours before his death he was apparently in the very best of health.

The illusion gave him a new line of thought. Was Montgomery Gaynor during his lifetime a good citizen? It was quite possible that superficially he was as other men are. Lots of men, Blayne argued, looked all right on paper. To all intents and purposes they bore unblemished reputations. Nearly all of them were model husbands. Even some of them had been good fathers, too; sincere and flagrantly honest in their intentions, and yet—there was always that other side to them that had lain hidden from the feverish eyes of the public until some little mistake had caused their undoing and revealed the duplicity contrived by the natural cunning of the human mind.

By the time Blayne arrived at the station he had categorically placed Montgomery Gaynor with Crippen, Peace, Smith and probably Frederick Voigt. It might reasonably be unjust. He realised that perfectly well, but he knew also that up to the present he had only Webster's somewhat prosaic history of the man, and most criminally he had known had quite uninteresting, almost suburban records. It was the unknown quantity in crime that made the game so damnably alluring, and equally elusive, yet so intriguingly fascinating.

Oaktree station was deserted when Blayne wandered on the platform, except for the station cat which was busily performing her afternoon ablutions in the narrow shade of an empty milk churn, which, beside himself, was waiting for the London train.

Finding that no preparations were being made to receive the locomotive Blayne sought the stationmaster in his airy little office, which had a vivid scarlet geranium in a pot on the window ledge.

"I suppose the three-fortys all right?" said Blayne, in that politely human way one generally deals with station officials who have a modicum of gold ornament on their peaked caps.

The stationmaster looked up from his perusal of an imposing sheaf of documents that had arrived that morning from the head office.

"The three-fortys been taken off these last six weeks, sir," he replied. "Don't ask me why they took it off, sir. That's not my business. The next train to town, sir, the five-twenty . . . gets in at six-ten. Sorry if you've been inconvenienced, sir."

Blayne regarded the little man shrewdly before replying. He was nearing sixty with almost white hair and rather delicate and kindly eyes. There was very little of the official about him and Blayne realised that he harmonised with the wayside station admirably. Anywhere else he would have been woefully out of place, an achroite among the chaos of crowds.

"I suppose I shall have to wait," admitted Blayne, cheerfully, "but perhaps the two hours will pass quickly enough. Is there anything really worth seeing in these parts?"

"Anything of particular antiquity . . . ruins, or that sort of thing?"

The stationmaster laid aside his sheaf of documents and turned to Blayne.

"There's the old church," he suggested, "only a mile and a half along the road. Nice old place with the only truly Norman tower for forty-five miles. Chestington the next, but I prefer Oaktree. Much better state of preservation, thanks to Mr. Montgomery Gaynor," he added, and paused. Then: "You know, sir, his death will be a big loss to Oaktree. Yes, a very big loss."
