CONTINUED FIRST TESTS

Christmas morning dawned clear and cold. So-so opened here eyes to find Chloe standing by her bed. "Merry Christmas, Miss Solange. Mr. Fred and Mr. Jerry just telephoned to say they was comin' over for breakfast. They'll be here in half an hour."

"Merry Christmas, Chloe; there's a package for you there in the left-hand drawer of my dresser. I'll get right up."

Chloe rummaged in the drawer and brought out a package. "I'll wait and open it when you-all open yours at breakfast after while," she said, carrying it away with her and prodding its sides as she went.

"I'll bet you can't wait that long, Chloe." So-so called after her.

"Oh, yes I kin; I got one from Miss Constance yesterday and Mr. Jerry and Mr. Fred got sumpin for me too."

So-so ran to the window, threw it up for a moment and drew in a deep breath of the keen cold air. Then she slammed the window shut and dressed hurriedly, collecting her presents for the boys as she finished and started downstairs. She was decorating the table with bunches of holly when Fred and Jerry came in.

"Merry Christmas, So-so," they called.

Jerry held a bunch of mistletoe in one hand. "Stand still, So-so. I bought this for Fred; he was too bashful to get any for himself."

Fred caught her and kissed her squarely on the mouth, Jerry followed suit and they all turned at a chuckle from the doorway where Chloe's ample form blocked the entrance. "Bet you-all ain't gonna hold it over ole Chloe's head," she said laughing.

"You'll be going home for a visit this afternoon, Chloe, and get plenty of kissing, I'll bet," Jerry teased her.

When breakfast was ready Fred said, "Presents first I want to see what I got this year. There's a box from my mother that feels suspiciously like an old-fashioned plum cake among other things."

"They called Chloe in, 'You're first,' Jerry told her.

Very soon Chloe was surrounded by boxes and tissue paper and her ample bosom and arms were decorated with a variety of bracelets, beads, a large dinner ring which Jerry had bought for 98 cents as a joke, but which Chloe admired extravagantly. "Never had a ring like this here before," she gloated, "and think of Miss Constance and Miss Solange both givin' me beads; pretty, ain't they?"

"Not Solomon in all his glory—" Jerry began.

"You're right Mr. Jerry," Chloe interrupted him. "The lilles of the field got nothing on Chloe this Christmas."

Solange attacked her pile next. There was a string of jade from Constance, a tooled leather writing case from Jerry, and embroidered guest towel from Chloe, and at the bottom Fred's huge box. "What in the world is this?" So-so asked picking it up and shaking it.

"Open it and see," Jerry advised. So-so tore off the wrapping and disclosed the flying costume. "Oh, Fred, you shouldn't have done this—I just love it, though," and she ran her hand over the soft leather.

Fred flushed with pleasure. "I thought maybe you'd wear it when we take the Golden Girl up this afternoon," he said.

"I'd love to, are you really going up in her this afternoon?"

"Sure thing—we've got a test load aboard, we want to see how much she'll stand, then if all goes well we'll wire Connie the news."

So-so had bought a thermos bottle in a leather case and warm flying gloves for Fred and Jerry. "Maybe you can use them on the flight," she said shyly as they thanked her.

"You bet we can," Fred said. "Warm hands and hot coffee; we'll need 'em both on this trip."

Jerry was unwrapping his package from Constance. "Well of all things!" he exclaimed, "measure for measure. Look at this." He held up a strap watch with one of Connie's cards dangling to it. On the card she had written, "I didn't have it engraved because I thought you'd like to have the time of your landing put on it after your trip."
