"Huh?" jerked out the startled theater man.

"I heard you say so when you saw him out. He'll be a dream," she breathed.

An ideal—thought Mr. Metzger. No one knew better than he the value of fan rumors. Wallis Kane a future movie star? Sure! Let her broadcast it all she liked. That was one way of stirring up interest in his man-about-town and the Wondertrip. He said admiringly, "I guess there isn't much that gets past you, Miss McCabe."

"Then I'm right."

"I don't say you are. And I don't say you ain't. Only don't let you get it from me."

"You can trust me, Mr. Metzger," asserted Miss Matilda with a solemn sense of obligation.

He had another thought. "You came here with Miss McCabe who won the trip, didn't you?"

"Yes, she's my cousin." The harmless lie came easier the second time.

"Don't give Kane away to her. Let her find out for herself. The manager was not going to let his prestige in for any more impersonations. If he had strained at being a man-about-town, he would certainly balk at playing a movie hero. Enough was enough. Mr. Metzger knew something about human nature, and was even conversant with the proverb dealing with the straw and the camel.

His proposal appealed to Miss Matilda's romanticism. "Oh, yes!" she agreed. "That'll be ever so much more exciting for both of them. I won't say a word."

"And say, couldn't you get her to can that veil? We need some shots for the newspapers."

"Not now, I'm afraid. She's a perfect sight, poor child! All this had been rehearsed between the two women. "Poison ivy affects her so terribly."

"Then I suppose we'll have to lay off till it clears up," he grumbled. "Anyway, we'll have all the newspaper boys at the pier."

Miss Matilda made a mental note of that. "Don't worry about my keeping the secret, Mr. Metzger. I'm running along and will see her at home? Good-by."

For she was too full of excitement to remain cooped up in the office any longer. She needed the breath of open air for her expansive thoughts. A Wondertrip, indeed! True, it was not to be her Wondertrip. How could it have been, in any case? If she were thirty years younger, now. But she could feel a glowing satisfaction in the knowledge that she had a substitute. Through the eyes of the girl, not suspecting what glorious allurement lay before her, the spinster could for once leave her own eager spirit in the light that never was on land or sea.

The secret ferment of vicarious romance was working its magic in Miss Matilda McCabe's unwithered heart.

Unsatisfactory though the interview at the Lex-Lohegrin had been to Mr. Metzger, Matilda got a great kick out of it. For her it was the beginning of Adventure. It stimulated an appetite which, however alien to a Lin, contributed something new to existence.

Uncomfortably aware that people were staring at the veil, Matilda took a taxi, snatched off the objectionable folds and crumpled them back of the seat. Somewhere in the Fifties she got out and walked. If anyone had told her that she was looking for trouble she would quite properly have resented it. She did not know what she was looking for. She did know that Simms Waring would be around at five o'clock to take her to tea at the Plaza and that she preferred to be elsewhere when he called. Compared to the Lex-Lohegrin, the Plaza lacked spice.

Casually she wandered into West 54th Street. A flamboyant sign arrested her, announcing that Ladies were Welcome at the Guest Day of Mallory's Academy of Rhythm, the Famous Ayton being Master of Ceremonies. Up One Flight.

"How about it, Toots?" inquired

Presentation to Rural Mail Carrier

It is sometimes difficult to say "Thanks" or show the appreciation you feel, to each of a large group of friends, such was my feelings when I recently received a generous sum of money together with the following:

Dear Hughie:—In gratitude for your courtesy and efficiency for the people on your mail route have contributed to this presentation. We feel you will appreciate that we are pleased with your good service and we offer you this with our best wishes of many more years as our courier.

Yours very sincerely,
Box Holders R. R. 1.
For this and also many other gifts received during the Christmas season, I wish to offer my sincere "Thanks" together with my best wishes to all for 1950.

Hughie J. MacDonald,
Courier R. R. 1, Armadale.

a voice over her shoulder. She turned and looked at a slim, slick boy whose eyes were lustreless as those of a lizard.

"Toots?" she inquired, interestedly. "Me?"

"Yes. Wanna go up and see what's doing?"

"No," said Matilda and perceived that this was not strictly truthful. She did want to go up, though not with this swain.

He tucked a hand beneath her arm. "Come on," he urged. "I'll show you a time."

"I don't believe I will, thank you," said she politely, and loosed his grip.

"Waitin' for a date, huh? Please yourself." He strolled away, though not far.

Strains of music floated down. A rhythm in her blood responded. Why shouldn't she accept the Welcome extended to Ladies? By Mr. Mallory's establishment? The feeling of those fingers on her arm had not been pleasant; there must be some way of avoiding that sort of thing. Back to her floated a gossamer fragment of the wisdom of the ages, embalmed in the lucid verse of Miss Dorothy Parker:

Men seldom make passes
At girls who wear glasses.

Across the street was an optician's shop. A pair of large amber goggles was fitted to her nose. Feeling no casual accosts, she mounted the stairs and entered a hot, wide room full of music and moving bodies.

Quietly she edged along the row of chairs to a far corner where she prepared to observe an alien world.

A tall young man, loiling near the door, took note of her. His was an observant eye for women, though not only solely or even mainly for sentimental reasons.

Mr. Raoul Ayton (born Lew Almond) was a business man. He had capitalized his practiced charm by marrying an elderly widow and running through a quarter of a million of her dollars before the divorce court separated him from that agreeable role and roll. Now, though doing well enough as the Mallory figurehead, he was looking for further opportunities of matrimonial finance.
