Despite the vast and insistent wartime demands made on Canada for gasoline and oil, not one aircraft has ever been grounded, a ship held in port, a farm tractor stopped, or a machine tool kept idle because of their lack. Among the many petroleum needs filled by Canada since the war began were those of the United States Army in building the Alaska Highway for the defence of this continent. Big gasoline dumps (top) were established at strategic points while (bottom) an oil barge runs docks at Norman Wells refinery to take on cargo of fuel for trucks and other road-building equipment.
