THE MORNING GUARDIAN

WEDNESDAY APRIL 4.

BRITAIN AMONG THE NATIONS.

Nations cannot be rewarded or punished as the individual will be beyond the grave. The award to a nation must be made within the duration of time and here on the earth. And yet one of the most stupendous pictures ever presented to the human mind is the judgement of the nations and the rewards and punishments meted out to them by the Supreme Judge. This judgement goes on from age to age. History in the large is but the record of that great Tribunal whose irrevocable decrees are given effect in the open sight of all men. From the beginning, nations have had their terms of probation and have been set upon the right hand or on the left, and those upon the left have gone away into the outer darkness of decay and oblivion. "Assyria, Greece, Rome, Carthage, where are they?"

And be it observed that while the nation can no more escape the due reward of its deeds than can the individual, the judgment of the nation is made upon the same grounds as the judgment of the individual. What is it in the national sense to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, minister to the sick and visit the prisoners, but to recognise the common brotherhood of all races, colors and creeds, to minister to all and provide equal liberty and equal justice to all? Doubtless every nation has come far short of this ideal and must humbly plead guilty to sad omissions of duty. But if we come to compare one nation with another in that regard we shall readily see why Britain has been set at the right hand in the great division and why to her has been given the heathen and isles of the sea for an inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession.

Beyond all comparison with any nation of past ages or with any of the present day, Britain has done most to extend the light of Christianity, and the blessings of civilization, liberty and justice around the world. Under no other flag than hers are there so many agencies that provide food for the hungry, water for the thirsty, kindly ministry to the sick, or just and humane treatment to the prisoners of so many races, kindreds and tongues. In no land is individual liberty so full and at the same time so secure against both the tyranny of power and the violence of the mob. In no other like area upon earth are the laws so uniformly just or the courts so pure and so impartial as within the British Empire. These are high claims but they can be sustained by appeal to the common judgment of intelligent mankind. And in the justice and humanity of her government and her laws, in the secure and ordered liberty of her subjects, in the great work she has done to set free the oppressed and enlighten the darkness of many lands, we see the reason why in the judgment of the nations Britain has been set upon the right hand and crowned with honor.

Enemies and rivals have predicted the downfall and decay of the British Empire and in every crisis of her national career have thought they saw the beginning of the end. It was thus, to go no further back, in the days of her struggle with Napoleon, And yet she emerged from that struggle for the first time mistress of the seas. It was so when the Indian mutiny broke out. But the India of today is an Empire, well-ordered, loyal and content beneath Victoria's sway. It was so when she was wantonly attacked by the Boer oligarchies of South Africa, a few months ago. But nations do not fall or sink into decay without a cause. Britain will never fall while standing true to the principles of justice and liberty which she has so long maintained. She will not fall nor be deposed until some other nation more just, more merciful, more humane than she, is ready with stronger and cleaner hands to undertake the great mission which has been entrusted to Britain. There is none that on the ground of superior merit, greater genius, and power, or fitness can claim her place or dispute her honors. She has been set on the right hand among the the nations by the fiat of the Almighty, and His judgment is just and enduring.

The Examiner does not directly reply to the charge that it desires the Conservative party to rule all the time, whether it is in a majority or not. But it does say it desires that the will of the people shall prevail. We think that when a measure has been twice passed by a large majority of the people's elected representatives that the fact carries with it prima facie evidence that the measure is in accordance with the popular will. What evidence has the Examiner to offer to the contrary? Not a word. We have cited the by-elections held since the Commons passed and the Senate rejected the redistribution bill. The Examiner's answer is that the West Elgin election was corrupt. If we admit this, there has been so much proved corruption on both sides that the single incident proves nothing as to the will of the people in regard to redistribution.

The esteemed Examiner finds a supreme example of the wisdom and utility of the House of Lords in the rejection by that body of the measure designed to give Ireland legislative independence. In this regard the Examiner differs from some of its party leaders who have distinctly favored Home Rule. There were those in Canada years ago who thought it would be disastrous to give the Province of Quebec a local legislature. But Qnebec is not the less loyal, but the more loyal for the concession thus made. By what process of reasoning does the Examiner reach the conclusion that the people of Ireland cannot safely be entrusted with a Parliament of their own? It would be interesting to have a frank and candid answer, even if the Examiner should find itself afterward in trouble with some of its Hibernian readers and patrons.

With Buller In Canada.

General Buller was in Canada with the King's Royal Rifles, and went out on the Red River expedition. One day on the march a private in the Rifles was trying to beg a pipeful of tobacco in vain, when he observed a figure just ahead of him that seemed familiar, and slapped him on the back saying. "Got a pipeful of baccy, mate?" The figure turned, revealing Capt. Buller. The soldier was overwhelmed with confusion. "Very sorry I can't oblige," said Buller, "but I haven't a pipeful for myself!" showing at the same time an empty pipe.
