MORE SUSPICIONS

Chapter 76

Violet was studying hard, and she was trying to play hard too. With such a combination, something had to suffer—her pleasures or her studies, or her health. But in some way she managed to pull through well enough. She passed the examinations and she told of ten of the commendation of her professors.
"I should not go out so much, I know," she said, coming in around midnight once. "But if I don't go with Bud when he wants to go out he feels badly and if he happens to be in one of his stubborn moods he goes anyway—with Pete and that crowd."
"Are you tired?" I asked noticing that her face was rather pale.
"No not very," she said. "Anyway, I have some reading to do for tomorrow. It's the first lecture I'd wait till morning."
She slipped out of her evening gown, which she had worn that night to a dance somewhere, and began loosening her hair. I always liked to watch her shake down that golden flying mass; like all brunettes, I admired blonde types immensely. But I saw that she looked a little tired; even her youth and vitality could not stand the pace she had set herself this winter.

"Better go to bed and get up early," I said shaking her hair all around her shoulders and putting on the blue kimono I had made her. "It's only literature, and that's easy to do. You go to sleep, and don't worry."
"But I don't sleep immediately after a lecture. I smell coffee coffee boiling. I got up too, and to a kimono and went into the living room."
"Dear child," I protested. "You must not drink coffee at this hour—its nearly one!"
"I know," I answered, coming in with a steaming cup on a tray. But my brain simply won't register. I've read 12 pages without an idea of what it all means. This will just stimulate me enough to finish my work—it won't keep me awake."
It smelled wonderfully good and I was wide awake myself by that time. So I, to poured myself some coffee and picked up the paper to read till the girl was through her lessons. It was no way to pre-serve one's health, but I was young and didn't break a rule once!

"I finished her work, and went out to get some crackers to eat. She wanted to talk something was on her mind."
"Did you know that Bud asked me to marry him the other night?"
"Yes—that is I thought so," answered Violet, she had brought up the subject. "These thin walls you know; it's hard not to hear."
"It's all right, I'm glad you did," I said settling lower down in the cushions of the chair and munching the cracker.
"Are you really engaged then, and are you happy?" I asked.
"Hated to intrude on her feelings, but I felt she wanted to tell me something."
"I don't know whether you'd call it engaged," she said slowly. "We're both pretty young, I guess I mean. Mother was married and I think Laura was born when she was my age—but things are different nowadays, and something more complicated. Anyway, Father had a farm, and their living was guaranteed by that. Bud has

Island Surgeons Honored in Boston

Dr. W. J. P. McMillan, accompanied by Mrs. McMillan returned Tuesday night from Boston, where he and Dr. E. T. Tanton of Summerside were admitted, with 754 other eminent surgeons from all over the United States, Canada, the West Indies, Mexico and South America to fellowship in the American College of Surgeons at the convention of that body in Symphony Hall on Oct. 27th.
The whole convocation from beginning to end was impressive. The two side sections of the lower half of the floor were occupied by the regular fellows of the college in their caps and gowns. There must have been 800 of them. The center section was reserved for the 756 candidates who were initiated. These filed in from the rear and took their seats soon after 8 o'clock.
Then came the Board of Regents and honorary candidates, headed by the military mace bearer holding the large bronze mace which he deposited in front of the speaker's table after the procession had reached the platform.
The great organ played a march until all were seated. The other parts of the floor and the balconies were crowded. In all, there were about 3000 present.
Rev. Dr. Alexander Mann of Trinity Church, in cap and gown, delivered a fervent invocation, concluding with the Lord's Prayer in unison. Then came the presentation of candidates by Director General Dr. F. H. Martin and the recitation of the fellowship pledge by the 756 surgeons admitted to fellowship. There was one from China, 13 from South America, one from Cuba, one from Newfoundland, 62 from other sections of Canada, and the balance from the United States, including 15 from the U. S. Navy and 15 from the U. S. Army. There were 65 from the U. S. State and 40 from Massachusetts.

Next came the conferring of honorary fellowship.
The eminent Italian surgeon, Prof. Raffaele Bastiane, then delivered the fellowship address, in which he eulogized the American College of Surgeons which had done him the honor to elect him a member four years ago and which he pronounced to be the greatest surgical body in the world in nine years.
Besides the 756 surgeons admitted at this convention among whom were some half dozen women—another impressive feature of the convocation was the admittance to honorary fellowship of 1000 specially distinguished surgeons from foreign lands. These were: Dr. Jose Arce of Buenos Aires, Dr. Jose E. Caruso of Havana, Dr. Henry H. Charon of Winnipeg, Dr. Andrew Fullerton of Belfast, Ire; Dr. Einar Key of Stockholm, Sweden; Dr. Guillermo E. Marchetti of Valparaiso, Chile; Dr. Santiago Pouey of Montevideo, Uruguay; Dr. Jose A. Fresno of Havana, Dr. Thibes Valdes of Mexico City, Mexico.

Dr. Tanton of Summerside who with Dr. McMillan shared the honor of being made a member of this distinguished College, has also returned home.
nothing to gain by marrying me and everything to lose."
"Where did you pick up that phrase—it doesn't sound like you?" I asked her.
"I picked it up from Peter," she said. "I don't like him, but he has a lot of intelligence, of a sort, and tonight he talked a lot to me."
"I mean, I'd marry Bud tomorrow whether he had any money or any prospects or not. I suppose the material things are important—but somehow they don't seem to matter to me. I'd go take a position in a nice place not nearly as nice as this, and I think we'd be awfully happy. Bud—"
"But what?" I asked.
"But I know Bud wouldn't be. He wants everything awfully comfortable—he likes money and he likes to spend it. He's earning $18 a week, that's all. I don't know when he'll get more. He seems to think the only way to do is to speculate, taking the tips Pete gives him and that he gets in other ways."
"He's been lucky enough to be encouraged—"
"Beginners' luck—fool's luck," Pete calls it. But he's in debt to me $500 and I think he owes that to Mr. Simons too. He won't tell me, but he has money—he spent a lot tonight. I saw several $20 bills in his wallet when he paid this evening."

Her blue eyes were very troubled as she looked at me over the table.
"And that's no basis to begin a happy marriage," she said. "I was just his salary and if he were honestly trying to make more, it would be different. But he couldn't tell when he won, and when he lost. He won't tell me any more. I do know this that Pete or Mr. Simons loaned him some more money and he bought something called C. X. Oil. They were talking tonight of it. They say its to go up five points tomorrow, and then Bud will make a dollar for every point it goes up, on every share he's bought."
Next day she came in, holding an afternoon paper, her face a little white. "Look here," she said pointing to the financial columns. "That stock Bud bought, went down, not up. That means he lost a dollar on every share, for every four points. I wonder how many shares he had and what's he going to do? And where does he get the money?"

Tomorrow—A Dinner
TO WASH DOWN QUILTS
A warm, soapy lather should be made as for flannels. Shake and brush the down quilt free from all dust and plunge into the lather, squeezing and kneading to free it from dirt. Rinse in warm water and gently squeeze it as free as possible from water hanging to dry. Shake frequently during the drying process. Choose a windy day for the task, as it will improve the down to dry quickly.

Mr. Hoggan Remembered Upon Retirement by His Office Staff

On Tuesday evening the staff in the Accountant's Office of the Prince Edward Island Railway, of which Mr. W. T. Hoggan was chief for many years, waited upon him in the office, and presented him with a beautiful easy chair, accompanied with the following address:
To Mr. William Thomas Haggan, Divisional Accountant and Divisional Passenger Agent, Canadian National Railway.
Dear Mr. Hoggan:
We are here tonight to say good-bye officially just members of your present staff and members of your old staff, with whom you have been associated for almost forty-one years, some of us looking back with respect and pride to the days when you were Chief Accountant, Auditor of Traffic and General Passenger Agent of the Prince Edward Island Railway System.
During these years we have seen you tried in many ways and at ways did you prove your fitness to be head of the foregoing combination of positions. We were taught by you to be truthful and loyal to the Railway and each other.
Today, on every hand, we hear from the employees over whom you have had jurisdiction, that in the different departments under your management no blunders were made, no losses were made and at your hands every man got a fair deal and, if he did not have the misfortune to drop below the line which marks the division between negligence and dishonesty, his chances for reinstatement were good.
In you the Railway had an official that was not rivaled by any one in the great Canadian National Railways, and the employees a friend rarely equaled.
It is with much satisfaction we learn your intention to remain in our town and that you have built a beautiful home in which to enjoy your well earned retirement. We would not forget Mrs. Hoggan in this connection and say that we hope you will both live long and happy in this new home.
It is also pleasing to us to know that we are going to have you near where you can visit the old offices often and where we will be able in the future as in the past to seek your advice in matters pertaining to Railway perplexities.
We now ask you to accept this small gift as a reminder of past associations.
THE STAFF,
Charlottetown, P.E.I.,
October 31st, 1922.

WHEN DRUGGISTS SOLD TOBACCO

Old time apothecaries in England used to sell for medicinal purposes not only strong wines but also tobacco. John Archer, physician in ordinary to Charles II, kept apothecaries' shops in various parts of London, and sold tobacco as all of them. Archer advised his patients to smoke, holding that "tobacco purifies the air from infectious malignancy by its fragrant sweetness, the breath strengthens the brain and memory and revives the sight of admiration." He charged two shillings an ounce for his tobacco, which was supposed to possess special virtues, "to be perceived after taking one pipe."

Francis Backon, Oliver Cromwell, Lord Chatham, Edmund Burke, Charles James Fox, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Brougham, Lord Lytton Disraeli, and Gladstone were remarkable for the size of their noses and so likewise was Abraham Lincoln.
Napoleon said if he could have officers enough with the right sort of noses he would conquer the world. The typical nose of an executive, and therefore a certain kind of leadership is a Gothic form. It slightly depresses as it juts from the brow the comes forward in more or less an arch. This is the nose to influence and command men.
It is interesting to note that General Kitchener did not have this kind of a nose, yet we know he both influenced and commanded men.

Man has evolved from an ape-like ancestor with a small nose, small eyes, and retreating forehead and chin, as his brain developed, his nose has grown bigger and longer his eyes have grown larger and, while his jaws have become smaller, he has acquired a chin.
The development of a baby into an adult human being reproduces in away the process of evolution by which the apelike creature of long ago has become a man. You yourself began with no nose worth mentioning. As you passed out of infancy you lost certain monkey-like physical traits, and with the development of your brain, your nose grew and became a prominent feature reinforced by bony structure.
Dr. Wood by no means asserts that persons with small noses are necessarily deficient in intelligence. He contends merely that if observation be made of any large number of people it will be found that a great majority of the clever ones among them have noses of more than average size.
Among the big-nosed ones were
