You wouldn't have the nerve to ask money for that tumble-down place, would you? And anyhow, you can't get blood out of a stone.

There is a terrible frankness about Edith at times.

But Jane is as equally determined not to occupy the house at any cost. It was written all over her yesterday, and there is still an ominous set look about her mouth. Between them I am more or less trimming skiff.

If Jane would be more open it would be easier, if she would only come to me and say that she is afraid of the house, I think I could reassure her. It may be that that silly photograph is still in her mind. But why would she not even say that she was yesterday? She went out into the garden and picked some of its neglected flowers instead.

"It's a pity not to use them," she said, and then looked at me with such a white and pitiful face that I put my arm around her neck. "I must have been a very bad husband," I said, "if you think I am going to force you to live here, 'Who am I,' I added 'against you and Edith?'"

But she did not smile.

"If you want to come here," she said, making what I felt was a painful concession, "why couldn't we live at the Lodge? It is really quite sweet. And we could rent this."

"Would that be quite moral, under the circumstances? I'm not asking the circumstances," I added hastily. "I'm simply putting the question."

"We could ask a lower rent."

There is I sometimes think, a fundamental difference in the ethical views of men and women. To Jane it was proper to let a house with what she believes is a most undesirable quality, if she lowers the price. She does not suggest advertising. "One house," she said, "is reputed to be haunted. On the contrary, it should be open to tenants with a lower rent, and once having got them there, to be able to say in effect: 'What would you? The house is cheap. True, it has certain disadvantages; I am sorry you have been bothered. But you have saved money.'"

Aside from this viewpoint, however, the idea is sound enough. We can be frank at the Lodge. And—let me be frank in this Journal—I may have my occasional yearnings for adventure, but they have their limitations. The talk Edith has reported as taking place between old Thomas and herself yesterday after I left them has revealed them to myself.

Edith, on the contrary, finds the situation thrilling.

"It's a good house, yes," said Thomas. For them as it likes it, wouldn't be caught dead in it at night myself."

"I hope you never will be," said Edith.

"It ain't nothing you can put your finger on," said Thomas. "It's just a feeling, a sort of a chill, a sort of a small red lamp was found to offer a least disturbance, and was customarily used."

June 24th.

Edith has lost and Jane has won. We shall spend the summer at the Lodge. But I feel that Jane's victory brings her no particular pleasure. I inquire last night that the concession she is making against some hidden apprehension, yet to show just how baseless are most of these things, this morning Clara has been in a low mood, and I heard her say, "I don't know what it is, but I feel that I have lost a tooth."

"I dreamed last night that I had a tooth," said Clara. "That's a sign of death, sure, Mrs. Porter."

Edith, however, has won in one of the boat-houses.

We motored out together today. I to look over the Lodge more carefully, and Halliday to inspect his prospective quarters. He is a very young fellow, not too handsome, and badly cut up at his failure to find a job for the summer.

"I do anything," he said. "Sell neckties if necessary! But I can't even land that. Although — I've even landed a grin — I have a nice taste in neckties!"

On the way out I told him something of the history of the house, and a little—very little—of Jane's nervousness concerning it.

"Of course," he said "it's all nonsense. But a surprising number of people are going bugs on it." "Darned uncomfortable nonsense, too."

"It's not only that, sir. It's dangerous. Imagine what a general conviction of this sort would do. Think of the fellows who find things getting a bit thick for them here, and how quickly they hop out of it! Think of the crimes that would care whether he lived or not. Talk about civilization going! Why the whole darned populace would go!"

In view of that conversation, it was interesting later that day, when I happened to have old Thomas intimate that Uncle Horace had noticed a natural death, but had "seen something" which had caused it.

curious thing, however, according to old Thomas, was the matter of lights.

When Annie Cochran found him the following morning, on the floor beside his desk, all the lights were out, including his desk lamp.

"But the red lamp was going in the den," said old Thomas. "It didn't make much light, so nobody noticed it until the doctor came. He saw it right off. I leave it to you, what shut off that desk lamp?"

I rather gather from Thomas that the ill-repute of the red lamp has spread over the country-side. The house had a bad reputation to start with, which Mrs. Riggs' tenacity did nothing to redeem, and now comes Annie Cochran and her red lamp, and a fairly poor outlook so far as renting the property is concerned.

There has been, according to Thomas, considerable interest as to whether we will inhabit the house or not, and if ever I saw relief in a man's face it was in his when he announced the story about a hundred years ago, when the property was first built to know if either Annie Cochran or Thomas has ever heard that red is the best light for so-called psychic phenomena.

The Lodge proved to be weather-proof and in good condition, and the boat-house quite livable, with the addition of a few things from the main house.

It fit me need thorough screening, however, on account of the mosquitoes.

(Note: It is necessary, for the sake of the narrative, to describe the house, to describe the level, and the dory and canoe belonging to the house are stored in the lower portion of it in winter. The old house, however, not in commission for several years, was at this time anchored to the bay, as a time red yards out in the bay, and a hundred of the buffeting of wind and tide.

Across the salt marsh, from the wooden run-way which led to the boat house and the beach. This walk also prolongs itself into a sort of ramshackle pier, from which a runway extends to a wood-just examination showed the float badly in need of repair, a number of the barrels which supported it having more or less gone to pieces.

It was, as will be seen, during Halliday's repair of this float that he made that discovery which was later to see the commencement of my troubles.)

All in all, Jane's scheme is practical, although Edith is frankly disappointed.

"I would have looked so sweet on that terrace!" she says, and makes a dreadful face at me.

I have asked her to say nothing to Jane about the matter, but she calls the old Thomas's ravings as she calls them. She has agreed, but accuses me of extreme terror, and maintains that I am merely putting the responsibility on Jane. "You know perfectly well," she says "that you believe in ghosts, and if you run that house old Horace ought to come back and haunt you."

But she is secretly pleased. She sees herself in the cottage, in a bungalow apron, presenting a picture of lovely but humble domesticity to young Halliday, and this forcing his hand. For if I know anything of Edith, she is going to marry him. And if I know anything of Halliday, he is going to marry nobody he cannot support.

It may be an interesting summer.

Curious about that lamp on the night the poor old lamp passed out. Of course, he might have turned it out and risen to get upstairs when he felt the attack coming on. But wouldn't he have laid the pen down first? One would do that automatically. It's a pity the blotting pad has been destroyed.
