GREAT DAM IN DANGER

(By British United Press) London, August 20. According to a story from Lahore, India, at any moment between now and October a great artificial lake nine miles long, 1,000 yards wide, and 30 feet deep is expected to sweep away the giant ice barrier which pens it up against the mountains of high Asia, 140 miles east of Leh on the borders of Kashmir and Tibet.

The lake was formed by an obstruction of the River Shyok, a tributary of the Indus. When the burst occurs a mighty avalanche of water, estimated at 120,000,000 tons, will crash down from a height of about 13,000 feet into the vale of the Indus, threatening destruction to about 60 townships and villages.

The Kashmir authorities, alive to the peril, are taking steps to warn the populace from six control points.

Anxiety is felt among railway engineers for the fate of bridge, especially the huge, costly one over the Indus at Attock, 450 miles down the valley.

It is even thought that work in progress at this great Sukkas barrage, another 450 miles farther down, on which millions are being spent, may be menaced.

"Sidney Street" In Berlin

(By British United Press)

BERLIN, August 21.—Early one morning Berlin witnessed a scene which reminds one of the famous Sydney-street episode in London.

As the dawn broke over the artisan quarter in the Northwest of the city, the latest revellers and the earliest workers were attracted by the intermittent discharge of firearms to a house in Sickingen-street, and eventually a very large crowd gathered.

The block was surrounded by policemen, and occasionally one of these was seen, pistol in hand, cautiously skirting the roof. Ambulance vans arrived and prostrate figures were borne out on stretchers.

Desultory shots continued. Sometimes there would be a sharp rattle of several in quick succession, sometimes a silence of a few minutes. Altogether, it appears, about 100 bullets were discharged.

For about two hours these mysterious doings were kept up, and then the principal actors dispersed, leaving the audience still wondering. Papers told a story worthy of embodiment in a Wild West film.

A week later a burglar, Albert Flatau, escaped from the Brandenburg Prison where he was serving a term of penal servitude for shooting a policeman. At two o'clock in the morning he knocked at the door of his divorced wife. When she opened it he hurried in her face the charge that she had betrayed him to the police, pushed her backwards into the flat, and began firing at her with a revolver. It was still dark, and he missed. The woman clutched her child from its cot and succeeded in hiding herself.

By the time the firing had alarmed a lodger, a mechanic named Von Halder, who in a few days was to have married Frau Flatau, he rushed out of the room, revolver in hand, and grappled with the intruder in a desperate life and death struggle. Locked in one another's embraces the pair tumbled about the room, reducing the furniture to a chaos of wreckage and emptying the magazines of their pistols. Either skill at this particular game was lacking to Halder, or luck was against him, for he was ultimately put out of action with eleven bullets in his body, though still alive.

At this juncture, however, a turn was given to the affair by the arrival of the police. Threatened with overwhelming odds, Flatau fled upstairs, and found on the top landing some sort of cover from which he opened fire on his pursuers. Checked here, the police cried a window on the opposite side of the court, level with that from which Flatau's landing was lighted, but the burglar's marksmanship was too good for them, and they soon abandoned this position. Finally, however, they got him under a cross fire from the roof and a scuffling in the courtyard, and finding that things were getting too hot for him, he bolted into the garret, and entrenched himself behind a barricade of packing cases and discarded household goods.

Here he continued the fight till a lucky police bullet hit him in the abdomen, and pain and faintness compelled him to surrender. He was still well supplied with ammunition, and at various stages of the fight he had declared his determination not to give in so long as he had a cartridge left.

French Editor Says England Victorian

PARIS, Aug. 20.—Despite lipstick and jazz, bottle and pajama parties and midnight mixed bathing, England is still Victorian. At least that is the verdict of M. Louis Romier, the French journalist who is now Chief Editor of the "Figaro". He has visited many lands and now wants to see England and Scotland again. Not that he has not already made up his mind about the island and its inhabitants. He has already done so and perhaps only to whet his appetite for his next visit he gives his views to his readers: "You have to go to Great Britain, not London," he says, "to get away from British snobbery and that American snobbery which has permeated the world. In Great Britain you will still find that good fellowship, genuineness and old provincial spirit which the British have always showered on the visitor with such exquisite courtesy. Nowhere in the world do the old customs of Europe survive as in old England and honest Scotland. Great Britain still has her lessons to give but who heeds them? She struggles but on the whole she is still in the Victorian era. A kind of heavy overpowering spirit of the past pervades the atmosphere—the imagination and breath of the new world are missing. Though Jeremiahs talk of over-population, tradé arises, crushing taxation, high cost of living, I do not believe their prophecies of the decline of Great Britain. Even in the suburbs you will find that family uprightness and solidity. Sense of national duty, respect for all that serves or represents the general interest are visible everywhere. England, the head of the greatest Empire that has ever existed, is patiently and painfully seeking a fresh balance between her needs and her strength. Her search she does not seem to be able to shed the very genuine friendship her people feel towards France."

Fire Destroys Birds

MANVILLE, Alta., Aug. 21.—Fire believed to have been caused by small boys took a heavy toll of bird life recently in the Birch Lake sanctuary, near here. The fire spread with such rapidity that practically all growth had been burned before residents could organize bucket brigades. Hundreds of young birds were burned in their nests and a large number of eggs destroyed. Investigators found one mother goose still protecting its brood despite the fact that she had been badly scorched and was scarcely able to fly.

Parliament Buildings Need Refreshing

(By The Canadian Press) LONDON, Aug. 18.—The Houses of Parliament, architecturally, may be a "poem in stone," as they were so described by the Emperor of Russia soon after their erection. But it hardly speaks well for the outward material of which they are composed that it should require a wholesale renewal after the lapse of less than 80 years. The stonework is now being refaced over considerable portions. The office of Works—the Department having charge of national buildings—is making arrangements for the disposal of the stonework to such Members of Parliament as may care to use it for making rock gardens on their private property, at ten shillings a ton. Gargoyles and other carved stonework will also be available in moderate quantities. Out of session, therefore, an M. P. will be able to smoke a contemplative pipe, while he gazes upon what used to help make up the Mother of Parliaments.

Young Ambassadors Charmed With West

(Special to The Guardian.) JASPER, Alta., Aug. 21.—After more than 4,000 miles of travelling overland since their steamer docked at Quebec, and with as many miles more to go before they sail for home, the Young Ambassadors of Empire are all agreed that their chief impression of Canada is its immense distances. The days and nights through the forests and across the plains, and the frequent changes of time have impressed them more than anything else, according to Mr. Frank L. Lasco, O. B. E., of the Allied Newspapers, London, England, who is director of the Empire Travel and Scholarship Scheme, which brought the fifty young people to Canada. Another thing they will always remember, he said, "is Canada's generosity. We have been treated like princes wherever we have gone." Ever since landing in Quebec on August 5th, the Young Ambassadors have been strenuously seeing Canada. Fifty boys and girls, whose intelligence in examinations placed them above 250,000 contestants, might be expected to meet every new experience with eagerness and these Young Ambassadors will return to their schools next month with a genuinely keen insight into Canada. Jasper came to them as a rest in the midst of what might be called their "official" duties. For two days they have been tasting for the first time the delights along the shores of Lac Beauvert. Yesterday afternoon they motored out to Mount

Edith Cavell, thrilling all the way as the cars climbed up by a series of breath-taking hairpin curves 2,000 feet, and exclaiming at the broad views of the Athabaska Valley, and the mountain ranges beyond. When they reached Mount Cavell they spent the remainder of the afternoon scrambling up the glacier. Nothing will likely stay in their minds longer than the getting in and out of those fissures and crawling up the steep ice slopes. After the drive they were the guests of Mr. R. H. Knight, Supt. of Jasper Park, and Mrs. Knight, at National Park, and Mrs. Knight, at Hell's Gate to old Fort Point, Mounties in scarlet tunics and wranglers under slouchy sombreros, added to the fun of the trip. In addition to the horseback ride, the Young Ambassadors today enjoyed a motor drive to Maligne Canyon.

they visited the University of Saskatchewan. The Calgary Board of Trade took them to the Prince of Wales Ranch, where they had luncheon, and they saw the Turner Valley oil fields. The City of Calgary entertained them to dinner, Saturday evening, and were welcomed by Supt. Knight and Capt. Prere, of the R. C. M. P. Regrettably, and with genuine regret, for Jasper Park was a dream of the mountains they scarcely hoped to realize, the left tonight for Vancouver, where they will stay on Wednesday. They will spend Friday in Edmonton, and most of Sunday at Minaki. Lady Marjorie Dairymple, O. B. E., and Mr. Kenneth Lindsay, M. A., assistant directors of the party, and Mr. S. Nicholson, special correspondent for the Allied Newspapers, declared they are as astonished and pleased with the tour as are Mr. Lasco and the Young Ambassadors themselves. Mr. Frank England and Mr. E. W. Brown, of the Canadian National Railways offices in London, and Mr. Colin S. Croft, of the Systems Montreal office, are also with the party. The tour is the joint enterprise of the Allied Newspapers, the Canadian National Railways and the Cunard Steamship Line.
