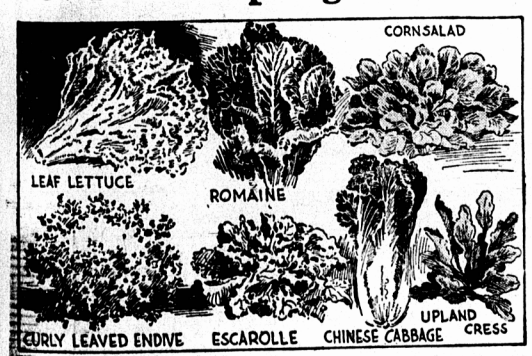
Vitamins Easy to Take in Bowl of Tempting Salad



Most important crops in the Victory garden, nutritionists assure us, are the "green leafy" foods, rich especially in Vitamin A, of which we eat far too little.

And this does not mean spinach, necessarily; nor should those who do not like spinach shy away from the subject. Among the green, leafy foods, are the leaves used in bowl salads, which will satisfy the nutritional needs of the family while at the same time delighting any civilized palate.

Famous chefs pride themselves on their salads. One uncooked salad may be served every day at dinner with a great variety of nutritious ingredients produced in the Victory garden. Bowl salad addicts often have a ritual, in which they mix the dressing at the table, and toss the salad in the wooden bowl, which is first rubbed with a clove of garlic in order to impart a suggestion of its flavor. While olive oil is not plentiful in war time, corn oil and other vegetable oils are plentiful and serve quite well for dressing.

Leaf lettuce is preferred by most chefs over head lettuce for salads. It is also far richer in vitamins. It comes in two types—the butter leaves, and the crisp leaves. The butter leaves are thicker, and darker green, with finer flavor, the experts say. Crisp leaves are lighter green in color, thin and somewhat brittle. Examples are Black Seeded Simpson, a butter type, and Grand Rapids, a crisp leaf type. Experts give first place in their esteem to the butter leaves.

Romaine or cos lettuce, which produces oval leaves, standing upright, is highly esteemed by French salad experts. It is a good late lettuce, standing heat better than the leaf varieties. The leaves can be bleached by tying them up as they near maturity, but this merely changes their color, and lessens their vitamin content.

For summer leaves, chicory, also known as endive, is more available than lettuce, which usually runs to seed in midsummer. Endive may be had with curly leaves, or broad leaves. Many like the curly leaves best for summer, and broad leaves (escarolle) for fall, as they endure frost and become sweeter after the frost comes. Sow both types in drills, thin out to six or eight inches.

Leaf crops grown in a similar manner, and much esteemed in bowl salads, include corn salad, which is very hardy and can be harvested late in the fall; and upland garden cress, which gives a pungent flavor to the salad.

In the fall lettuce may be grown again; and the Chinese cabbage leaves are delicious. Chinese cabbage may be grown in the spring, with rich soil and an early start. But in midsummer, it always runs to seed. A late crop has no such tendency, and heads are easily produced in the fall, from plants started in late June.

All leaf crops demand rich soil. They must grow fast without check, otherwise the leaves are tough and have a bitter flavor. Plant food should be applied to the soil in which they grow at the rate of 4 pounds to 100 square feet.

N. S. Ruling Re Old Age Pensions

HALIFAX, April 16—(CP) — In the first case of its kind in Canada, the full bench of the Nova Scotia supreme court ruled Saturday that the province's Old Age Pensions Board can collect from the estate of deceased pensioners monies paid in pension, whether or not the person was being paid at the time of death.

The ruling was given in the claim of the board against the estate of Margaret Murphy of Halifax, who died in 1942. She had received a pension from 1934 until three months before her death, when the board suspended payments because her income was more than $365 a year.

The board claimed $2,347 from her estate, but a lower court had disallowed the claim because she was not a pensioner at the time of her death.

Senate Discussion On The Petitcodiac Water Power Scheme

Continuation of the debate in the Senate, March 29, on the purposed survey of the Petitcodiac water power scheme:

Hon. Mr. BLACK (Saskville, N.B.): Honourable senators, I think there is some misunderstanding with regard to this matter. So far the people of the Maritime Provinces have not asked the Federal Government to finance this scheme. The resolution moved by the honourable senator from Moncton (Hon. Mr. Robinson), which was discussed before the committee in a very interesting manner, requested only that the Federal Government, through a competent body of engineers, thoroughly investigate the situation and decide whether the project is feasible. The resolution does not suggest that the Federal Government should be asked to pay the total cost of everything but the initial investigation.

Hon. Mr. EULER: Certainly the honourable senators who spoke made this suggestion—

Hon. Mr. BLACK: They have intimated that they wanted help; and there is no reason why they should not do that. But before this scheme was presented to this House it was discussed by a committee with the government of New Brunwick, and that government is greatly interested in it. This is not a private enterprise. There is a company—and I am one of the charter members of that company—which was established thirty-five years ago with the idea of looking into the feasibility of this development. We did not get anywhere, because the project was too big to be undertaken by a private group in that province, and at the time there did not seem to be an opportunity for the development and sale of the power that there is today. Conditions have changed. Now, if the power is developed, undoubtedly there will be a great demand for it, not only in Prince Edward Island, but also in the rural sections of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Furthermore, the enormous mineral deposits in the immediate vicinity of the development will undoubtedly attract manufacturing plants, which will consume a considerable portion of the power.

Cheap Money Required

But I am getting away from my line of thought. I have no doubt that the New Brunswick Government will be ready to share in the cost of development if the scheme proves fesible. It may be that all that will be asked of the Federal Government is cheap money. It is my belief that the three Maritime Provinces will work together in the development of the power once it is demonstrated, as I believe it will be, that the undertaking is practicable. All we want is sympathetic support of the proposal that there should be a thorough investigation by competent engineers. Once that has been given, I feel confident that if the report is favourable, we in the Maritime Provinces will develop the project along proper lines and will not ask the province of Ontario to help us.

Hon. J. A. CALDER: Honourable senators, I had intended to say a word or two along the very lines of the remarks of the honourable member who has just spoken.

We have had two or three very interesting addresses in regard to development in the Maritimes, and the need, at a lower cost if possible, of further development. But we must remember what is the real point that we are discussing. The question is not the desirability of this or that or the other thing, but whether or not we should approve an expenditure of $50,000 for an investigation into the feasibility of a proposed power scheme. That is the sole question at issue. There is no question as to who shall build any plant, or what rates shall be charged, or anything of that nature at all.

Cites P.E.I. Position

This brings me to the one real point raised by the honourable senator from Leeds (Hon. Mr Hardy) and his desk-mate from Waterloo (Hon. Mr. Euler), as to whether or not we, as members of the Senate, should approve an expenditure of $50,000. They are inclined to think this is a purely provincial matter. Much could be said in favour of their views. However, I do not myself take that view, and I would not take it in regard to any section of the Dominion. You have to regard the position of the Maritime Provinces. You cannot compare Prince Edward Island with any other province in the Dominion; neither can you compare Nova Scotia and New Brunswick with our larger provinces. They are not in the same category. If these three Maritime Provinces were united as one, with the larger population and greater wealth, a comparison could be made with Ontario, or even with British Columbia or any of the other large provinces. But that is not the position. For some reason or other the Maritime Provinces have decided not to unite, but to remain separate, and the only point we have to decide is whether or not this Chamber should approve of the Federal Government aiding to the extent of $50,000 in the holding of an inquiry to lern whether or not this proposed scheme is advisable.

I take the view that the development of electrical power in these three provinces is more than a purely local question. It is something that is of advantage to Canada as a whole. The development of four hundred thousand horsepower of electrical energy in the Maritime Provinces would mean

Chapter IX

Cherry pulled at Simon's sleeve. "I think we might slip away soon, darling."

Jerry looked at her reproachfully. "You can't go yet. It's much too early."

"Oh, yes, we can," said Cherry determinedly. "Simon darling, let's go now, shall we? Valerie won't mind. She knows you and I don't have much chance to be on our own together."

That, she thought, should show Mr. Jerry Millar just how she felt about her husband, lest he should be under any delusion in the matter. She held out her hand to him. "Good-bye, Jerry. It's been nice seeing you again."

It wasn't, she told herself fiercely, but she had to be polite. Besides, maybe something might come of this meeting. She would turn up at the Mayfair on Monday as she had arranged and as he doubtless was quite sure she intended to. Only how very much she wished that she needn't give him the impression that she was doing something she was hiding from her husband, making a secret date with him about which Simon mustn't know. It was hateful to feel that the two of them were planning to meet on the quiet. And yet it was, unfortunately, just what they were doing. And since it was impossible to explain to Simon why she had wanted to lunch with Jerry, it was also impossible to tell him she intended to do so.

Jerry held her hand far longer than was necessary. "Good-bye Cherry, I'll be seeing you."

On the surface those words meant nothing. But his eyes told her the time and the place just as if he'd spoken the very words aloud. She felt the color run up her cheeks and the palms of her hands grew suddenly moist.

Simon saw the rising color. He saw, too, the way Jerry Millar looked at her. It made him wonder what it was all about, and then hate himself for wondering. What was wrong with him? He wasn't a suspicious sort of fellow as a rule. Neither, he hoped was he given to being needlessly jealous. He trusted Cherry utterly. Only, what was it he heard about this chap Jerry Millar? The name struck a chord in his memory. He had heard it before tonight, but not from Cherry, he felt certain. Still that meant nothing. She could not mention all the men and women she'd known before they'd met. A frown knit his brows as he stood waiting for her to get her things.

Jerry Millar? Jerry Millar? Ah, now he had it! It was Denise who had mentioned him. What was it she'd said? Funny how he couldn't remember. Then in a flash he had it just as if Denise's letter were there before him: There's been a new man who's been around quite a lot lately. He's very taken up with Cherry. His name's Jerry Millar."

He sounded her about him as they drove down the quiet country road. "I haven't heard you mention that fellow Millar before, have I, Cherry?"

"No, but then I hardly know him, Simon. He wasn't really a friend of mine."

Simon spun around a corner. He tried to tell himself that he'd been mistaken. Maybe it was some other man Denise had mentioned. Yet somehow he didn't think so. Perhaps Cherry had her own reasons for not wanting to own him as a friend. That sounded perfectly feasible. Perhaps she wanted to forget she'd ever wasted any of her time with him. "Can't say I took to him very much, my sweet."

Cherry moved a little along the seat and snuggled nearer to her husband. "Don't let's talk about him, Simon."

"Rather not, don't want to. It was just . . . well, forgive me, Cherry I dont want to sound like a jealous husband, but I'd hate to think you might still want to run around with him. If I were really honest with you I'd say I'd much prefer to know that you'll have nothing more to do with him."

Cherry stared straight before her along the white ribbon of moonlit road. Why in the world had Simon had to say just that? It wasn't like him. It made her feel so dreadful. There was that pending meeting on Monday with Jerry at the Mayfair. She wished now with all her heart that she'd never agreed to it. Yet there were things that she so much wanted to know that only he could tell her. For her own future's sake and Simon's there seemed no way of escaping it.

She drew a little swift breath. "Oh, Simon darling, there's only one man I want to run around with now! I don't need to tell you what his name is, do I? As for Jerry Millar . . ." her voice trailed away. She couldn't say that she wouldn't see him again. It was out of the question that she could bring herself to lie deliberately to Simon. Still, she was allowing it to go by defaulted.

A wave of misery swept over her. The weekend to which she'd been looking forward so eagerly seemed now to promise difficulties and evasions. If Simon brought up the subject of Jerry Millar again . . .

But Simon was privately deciding that the fellow's name needn't be mentiontd any more between them. He was telling himself with some releif that of course he had no cause to worry. There was perhaps something behind all this Jerry Millar business that he didn't quite understand, but it wasn't for him to evince curiosity concerning it. He felt indeed just a trifle ashamed of himself. He loved Cherry pie utterly and he trusted her completely. And hadn't she told him a moment ago that she wanted no one but him? It was clear that he'd been a fool to allow himself a moment's anxiety.

For Cherry that weekend was yet another spell of heaven. Resolutely she put all thoughts of Jerry Miller from her mind, and all thoughts of Denise, too. She felt almost inclined to congratulate herself on her ability to forget things that might prove unpleasant to remember. But with Simon at her side it was so easy. He occupied all her thoughts. He Was so terribly dear to her.

Sunday was a lazy day. They walked in the morning and sat beneath the apple trees on the lawn in the afternoon, side by side on low sometimes silent. They planned their next meeting. A fortnight hence there would be another weekend. If Cherry could get an odd evening off, even if only a few hours she'd slipp up to town. But she was afraid it was unlikely. They planned their lives when the war might be over. They played a little game. It was over now. Simon was back in his regular job. Cherry was keeping house at the cottage.
