Wisdom's Gate

By Margaret Ayer Barnes

Before noon the next day, Cicily's father called her on the telephone. "I've talked with Fox," he said briefly, "and wired to Aiden. He'll send you the money. In fact he'll mail it."

"Thank you," said Cicily, with equal brevity. She hoped that her father would tell her no more. His words had implied that Fox had been convincing, but she didn't want to know if he'd mentioned Harold Doty.

The very next morning before breakfast was over the check arrived from Uncle Aiden. At Mail, Special Delivery, Cicily endorsed it before Albert left for town. As she handed it to Albert she had no sense of loss.

But he in accepting it seemed to realize everything. The humility, gratitude shone in his eyes. "Don't make a speech," said Cicily hastily.

And they both laughed. He seemed ready at last to accept her as a friend and a partner. That very evening he showed her the papers that had been signed by Doty and reported his departure Maloney, of Montreal. Mr. Maloney was a prominent lawyer and a partner of Hon. Brooke Claxton, minister of defence. His wife, also a victim, was the former Odette Ouellet, daughter of Wilfrid Ouellet, vice-president of Rimouski Airlines.

"What about Fox's bill?" Cicily asked anxiously. "I'll settle that myself," he was eager to assure her. "It's not very large."

Finally, one evening when the children were busy with their home work in the dining room and Cicily sat by the living room fire, "I've left for New York today," he informed her casually.

"She could not help asking, 'Did you see her off?'" "No I had lunch with her," he volunteered calmly.

Again she faced the fact that she had once emphasized the truth could be unpleasant. She asked, "Was that necessary?" her voice a trifle sharp.

"He answered, 'It was kind.'" She could not deny that. "I'm glad you were kind," she said somewhat stiffly and very untruthfully. Then suddenly anguish welled up within her and after a moment of painful irresolution she said, "I hope she still loves you?" with pitiful intensity.

The question surprised and a little embarrassed him. "Well," he said awkwardly, "not as she did."

The implication that she had, shook Cicily about as if she had not known it before.

But Albert was continuing, his embarrassment conquered. "I think she's very fond of me. But she's sensible and ambitious. She's ready for New York. Excited by the thought of it. She's never been anywhere but here and she's going to give up her job and her suits her exactly. She wants to be free."

Cicily sat silent, trying to visualize the woman he had described. "Would you rather I hadn't told you?" His tone was solicitous.

But Cicily pricked that bubble of solicitude. "It's not what you told, Albert. It's what you do."

The distinction she had drawn did not seem to impress him. "You said you liked the truth," he reminded her plaintively. "I told you once before that I knew that you wouldn't."

She said, with some impatience, "Has it never occurred to you that you might make the truth agreeable?"

His eyes glinted faintly with a spark of humor. "Ah, that," he informed her, "is difficult to do."

As the weeks went by, Cicily's dream of a relationship that would be friendly and affectionate and pleasing more disturbingly resolved itself into the purest poppycock. Under the discipline that she had imposed on him, her husband seemed rather an acquaintance than a friend. A trifle faint, but not so suited to a Platonic role. Neither was she, though she was slower to admit it.

If Cicily had wished for distraction from the way in which she could easily have found it. The weeks before Christmas were always gay in Lakewood. The social season was opening in town. Friends the day took the time to repay with theatre and opera parties the hospitality of the summer. In the suburb itself, the young married set, facing the compensatory doldrums of the winter, conscientiously organized bridge dinners and cocktail parties and dances at the country club.

Social entertainment was essential to Albert. If he could command the suburban variety, he accepted it indulgently, reserving the right to deride it as provincial.

At least that was the way it had been last December. The safety of Lakewood had proved a delusion. Albert carried in himself the elements of danger. And she had no heart for safety.

Parties seemed puerile. Preparing for Christmas was a dreary obligation. She couldn't face the irony of her own bedecked reflection in a dress-maker's mirror. She gave up the concerts after having wept at one, furiously, desolately, throughout an adagio. Misery, she thought, could be better borne alone.

Albert, on the contrary, seemed eager for diversion. Their evenings at home by the living room fire weighed heavily on his spirits. He made an honest effort to converse with her pleasantly, but there seemed to be increasingly little to say. You couldn't say much when the things that you were thinking remained utterly un-

PUTTING ON POUNDAGE People talk so much about being too fat that it is news when somebody sighs for more poundage. Recently a worried wife asked advice about a diet for her underweight husband. The doctor had ordered 3,000 calories a day for him. The man in the case could be led to the menus and could not be made to eat.

Sometimes people are underweight because they lack appetite so food does not appeal to them. If constantly under-filled, the stomach will shrink and simply cannot hold much at one time. One alternative is to eat smaller amounts frequently rather than heavier meals at three stated intervals.

Breakfast is a must. Fruit stimulates appetite. Ready-to-eat cereal with cream and sugar is nutritious without seeming too filling. An improvement takes place, add other items to the menu—toast, jam, bacon.

Milk at mid-morning usually is procurable even at the office. The noon meal, if eaten away from home, should be chosen carefully to supplement and add to the other meals. A snack in the afternoon, dinner (not too heavy) and cereal with milk before going to bed.

Don't discuss food at meals. Keep extras in the house such as crackers and cookies. Some cookies are hard, even for an underweight husband, to resist.

Estonians Flee Soviet Communism; Seek Homes Here

(By The Canadian Press) STORNOWAY, Scotland, Aug. 2 - A party of 73 Canada-bound emigrants arrived here today from Gothenburg, Sweden, on their way to Halifax.

The party, comprising three poles and 70 Estonians, including 15 children, arrived on the Ostervag, whose skipper, Capt. Paast, said two other boats had left before him and that others were preparing to sail.

A cable received here last night reported the safe arrival at St. John's, Nfld., of the Astran, an Estonian motor fishing boat, with 29 Estonians fleeing from Soviet Communism. The vessel left Sweden July 17.

Capt. Paast said: "There are many Estonian refugees anxious to go to Canada from Sweden. It is too hot there near Russia."

The Ostervag is provisioned for a month but it is hoped to make the crossing in a fortnight. There was no difficulty in getting away from Sweden, where the authorities were most helpful, Paast said.

Several of the crew have worked in Canada or lived there, and all have Canadian friends with whom they have been corresponding, he said.

Shortly after her arrival in Stornoway, where she was putting in for water and fuel, the Ostervag was visited by Dr. A. E. Kerr, president of Dalhousie University, Halifax.

Dr. Kerr, who is flying home in 10 days, was anxious to know whether he could do anything for the emigrants when they reached Canada.

MONETARY UNIT The national monetary unit of Panama is the balboa.

the gifts were then placed on the table by Mrs. Elmer Fyfe and Mrs. Ray Douglas. A beautiful array of pyrex, cutlery, silver, blankets and electric appliances, also a large sum of money was received for which Vivian very graciously thanked one and all.

Music and sing-song was enjoyed and a delicious lunch was served by the ladies to over seventy relatives and friends.
