TALES TOLD BY MEN ON THE FIGHTING LINES ON LAND AND SEA

HIS SON, HIS CHUM, TOO, KILLED

Gordon Bruce in his London letter in the New York Tribune writes: It was very quiet in the little restaurant off Piccadilly Circus. The early diners were gone. Supper time was two hours off. Only four—all strangers to one another—were in the place.

A very pretty woman, of perhaps twenty-six, sat nibbling a bit of cheese and sipping coffee. Her table was next mine. A few yards away a ruddy-faced young Englishman ate his chop with great relish and copious applications of meat sauce. He wasn't wearing an armband.

Just behind him a well built man, who looked to be past forty, toyed with a half finished whisky and soda. He only picked at his meal, and spent most of the time gazing abstractedly into the flickering fire in the grate close by. The shifting light showed a fine, strong face; nose rather thin; solemn, brown eyes, and his hair, of the same color, was thick and wavy. He appeared as one whose poise could not be shaken.

Into the silence of the place came a small waiter, stepping noiselessly. "Here's a message for you, Mr. —," he said to the man I have just described. "They knew you would be here."

The man started a little and stared at the envelope before picking it up. Then he hastily ripped it open. His eyes rested on the paper within and his face went dull. Slowly he took out a message, which he held, the sheet, dropped to the table. His right hand was clasped about the glass containing his drink.

He continued gazing at the message as it lay before him. It seemed as if the words were too preposterous for credence. Nevertheless he looked away and then back again to the slip.

Suddenly he crushed his glass to bits. The liquor ran over the table, filtering through a tiny pile of fragments of glass, and at the same time a bright red stream gushed upon the white cloth.

For a moment he stared stupidly at the wreckage of the tumbler; at the red stain; at the telegram. Then he stood up and looked wildly about. His face worked frightfully and his eyes was a terrible appeal which I hope I may never see again. He drew his hand across his forehead, not heeding the blood which flowed from his hand. Then he made a pitiable effort to pull himself together.

There he stood, alone, struggling with himself for what seemed an hour. The rest of us sat, breathless, waiting. Not a word had been said. But it was no use.

Staggering like a drunken man, he made his way toward the door. But the young woman caught his elbow. "What is it?" she begged. "Can't I bandage your hand?"

Mechanically he sank into a chair.

"He's dead." The two words came in a broken voice. Another attempt to compose himself. "This time it came nearer to success. 'My boy,' he explained. 'My son; no—he wasn't my son. He was my chum.'"

And he repeated the words over and over again. "My chum—my chum."

Again the wideness came upon him. He tore away the hand about which the girl was wrapping a bit of napkin. "Look at it!" he almost screamed. "Look at it. It says he's dead! And he was my chum, my chum, my son!"

The ruddy-faced young man tipped over, turning away his head as he passed the stricken father. The latter saw him go, and in a flash he became steady. In an even voice he said: "Good God, this won't do, I must buck up."

He smiled as he extended the gashed fingers to the girl. She went on, deftly tying the ends of the cloth and murmuring words of comfort to the while.

"Thank you," he said, as he turned to go, the message crumpled in his whole hand. "It got me a bit hard for a minute. I'm sorry I gave way. But," and he drew himself up stiffly, "I'm forty-six to-night. Tomorrow I shall be thirty-eight—do you hear?" And he went out into the night.

TOMMY DESCRIBES HIS QUARTERS IN THE TRENCHES.

I noticed a letter in Club from an officer out here ("somewhere in France") to a friend in Edinburgh, and thought it would make a good contrast if I were to describe our "dug-out" in the trenches writes an old campaigner.

We are sitting in a hole in the ground, on a stick about two feet high, placed from one side to the other, with our feet in a pool of water about nine inches deep. Originally we wore the kit, but we found it more comfortable to wear sandbags round our waists, as when one bag gets dirty, it can easily be replaced by another clean one. The walls consist of sloping banks of wet earth, kept on the move by the force of gravity.

We can always keep warm by continually baling out slush, and, if it is not raining at night, we can sit and count all the beautiful stars in the heavens above.

"Tommy's cooker" of inferior design, burns drearily on the top of a stake, in the futile attempt to raise the temperature of a mess tin of water to boiling point.

The movables in this "snug retreat" consist of three sets of equipment, three packs, three rifles, and ironry of ironies, three soaking blankets. If you go up the flight of six earthen steps, of which only three are visible, you find a doorway disgracefully hung with a wet, muddy ratan bag, and, if you have the usual luck you stumble on the floor mat and find yourself in a snumphlopp if you should go out by the other door—which we would certainly warn you against doing—we should just wish you "good-bye" and go and report you missing.

A little way down we come to the first step to which we draw ourselves periodically to stand and shiver for two long weary hours.

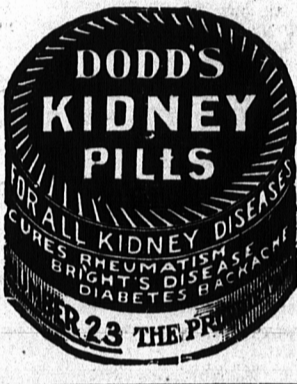

This is a true description of our little dug-out in which we are expected to live for some time. We have the consolation of knowing that "Old Fritz" over the way is just as badly, if not worse off than ourselves.

Some of our chums in another Highland regiment have just passed, going on leave, and if they swim the Channel they will arrive home in a much more respectable condition than they are now in.

In spite of these little difficulties "the Jocks" are still in the best of spirits and the pink of condition, and always look forward to the arrival of your excellent paper every week.

A Safeguard for the Family Welfare

The question often arises as to how much Life Insurance a man should carry to properly protect his family. Here is something that will help you to decide. A man earns so much.....he spends so much on himself.....aside from what he perhaps saves, the balance goes to the support of the family.....

Should death occur, this last amount, the balance, is what his family will require annually to live in the manner to which they have been accustomed.

For your own information fill out the following:—

- 1. Total annual family expense is.....$
2. Deduct amount of personal expenses.....$
3. Balance being annual income needed to support family.....$
4. Estate required to yield needed income at 5 per cent.....$
5. Deduct net cash value of your estate to-day.....$
6. Balance estate not yet created.....$
7. Deduct amount now covered by Life Insurance.....$
8. Additional Life Insurance needed.....$

At death Life Insurance takes your place as an income producer. $20,000 at 5 per cent interest, earns yearly..... $1,000 25,000 at 5 per cent interest, earns yearly..... 1,250 30,000 at 5 per cent interest, earns yearly..... 1,500

The poorer a man the more he needs insurance. The rich man requires insurance to protect his estate. The Company acting in the capacity of Executor and paying regular monthly or annual instalments as desired, thus safe-guarding the principal.

The Great-West Life Policies give the most protection for the least money and pay the highest dividends to policy holders.
