"Jealous Hearts"

By MILDRED BARBOUR

LIFE'S A SEESAW

Colonel Deering returned to Lynnwood at the end of the following week. He had stopped off in New York to see Elinor and had been enchanted by the graciousness of her reception. It was like Elinor to receive him with warmth and enthusiasm, for no reason at all, except that it happened to be her mood at the moment. She dropped her lessons, her social engagements, and gave him all her time. She flattered him by assuring him sweetly that she'd rather go about with him than with any young man in New York.

Nevertheless, Colonel Deering was worried when he returned home. Elinor, in her usual careless fashion, had been quite frank about Tony's loan. The colonel broached the subject to his son at his first opportunity.

They happened to be in the library, at the time, and one of the French windows was open. Neither of them knew that Millicent was lying on the terrace, just outside, in a chaise longue, drowsing in the sun and protected by an angle of the house from the stiff autumn breeze.

She was wrapped in a gay woolen shawl, as indolently content as a cat in the sunshine, and the murmur of the men's voice came to her indistinctly and rather soothingly.

It was Elinor's name that caught her wandering attention. She heard Colonel Deering's emphatic tones:

"I must say, my boy, that I think you were a bit indiscreet. You should have consulted me and let me advance her the money."

To which Tony replied, a trifle sulkily:

"She particularly didn't want any one to know about it."

"But she told me, at once—said you had been very generous, else she couldn't have gone on with her lessons."

Millicent lay very still in the wicker chaise longue, not because she wished to listen, but because she was physically powerless to move. She knew that she ought to get up and go away, or make some noise to let her husband and his father know that they were overheard. But she felt suddenly sick and cold; the sunlit world receded round her in dark, dizzy circles.

Dimly she heard Tony's voice again:

"There's no harm done, Dad. No body knows about it—anyway, what if they did? Elinor's one of the family. What difference does it make whether it's Millicent or you or I who helps her out of a hole?"

It makes a great deal of difference, Tony. There might be ugly gossip.

Millicent dragged herself to her feet. The gay shawl dropped to the ground. She tripped over it, stumbled, and caught at the wall for support; then, slowly, like a blind person, she felt her way to the front door, through the wide colonial hall, and up to the refuge of her own room.

She fell across the bed and lay, not sobbing, but staring with wide eyes at the graceful pattern of the wall-paper.

There was no longer any doubt in her mind concerning Elinor and Tony.

When she came downstairs to dinner, there was a curious change in her. Colonel Deering noticed it immediately, although he couldn't quite define it. But it seemed as if only the shell of the old Millicent took her place at the table, a shell that was daintily groomed and daintily gowned. A very pale smile on her red lips. Youth and laughter had fled from her eyes. It was as though a magic hand had wiped away her radiant youth with a single gesture.

When Tony went up-stairs that night, after sitting late before the open fire in the library, he tried his wife's door and found it locked.

He had too much pride, and too little interest as a lover, to ask for an explanation. Nor did he ever try that door again; so he didn't know that it remained locked.

Millicent dragged through the ensuing weeks and months, a pale, silent ghost of herself. Her heart whispered ceaselessly: "You've lost him forever." And her brain reminded her clearly: "You never had him."

Thanksgiving holidays came and went, and Millicent's little household was a great success. Christmas arrived, with the elaborate preparations that were a part of Lynnwood's program every season. Colonel Deering gave Millicent a string of real pearls, and Tony dutifully presented her with a diamond and sapphire bracelet.

Can Eat Anything Now!

Her Indigestion soon ended by "Fruit-a-tives"

MRS. E. WHITE

West Toronto, Ont.—"I feel it my duty to write you in regard to your wonderful tablets 'Fruit-a-tives.' I suffered from indigestion for months and could not eat a square meal. I started taking 'Fruit-a-tives' and now eat anything and feel like a new person. I hope this letter will help other sufferers."

—Mrs. E. White.

Fruitatives gives sure relief from indigestion. It is made of the juices of fresh ripe fruit, combined with tonic, and causes the whole digestive tract to digest and assimilate food and to eliminate waste as nature intended it to do. Let this wonderful medicine help you. 25c and 50c a box.

She put the latter gift away in her jewel-box. She found no joy in decking herself with lovely things these days. What a mockery it was, she thought, and wondered bitterly what Tony had given Elinor for Christmas.

Elinor didn't come home. She was very busy with her lessons, she wrote, and added jubilantly that Alan Jacobs, who believed in putting his pupils before the public from the very beginning, had arranged some recitals for her. Danelli was wild with "professional jealousy," she said, but Tony, reading between the lines, smiled with bitter understanding.

It wasn't very long before Elinor began to be heard from in the musical world. Her beauty, as well as her nerve, carried her along, buoyed up a talent that was both brilliant and erratic. Neither Elinor nor her voice could ever be fully depended upon.

But Jacobs, who had more influence in musical and dramatic circles than Danelli, succeeded in putting her across. She sang first at charity entertainments, later in amateur productions of light opera, and finally burst with full glory and great acclaim upon the professional concert world.

Beauty and determination, coupled with that charming persuasion of hers that always made people see her in the light she desired, rarely met in the actuality, carried her across. She sang well, and her critics agreed that so young an artist could not be expected to inter-act dramatically. She knew her power and she wove her spell upon individuals and audiences alike.

It was a difficult time for Millicent. She rejoiced that Elinor was successful; she was intensely proud of her; she tried to pray that Elinor would reach her far-flung goal. But every step of Elinor's along the path of success increased Millicent's bitterness over her wrecked happiness.

Elinor, in New York, with Tony yearning for her, as Millicent was confident he did, was bad enough. But Elinor's pictured face, her name, intruding, insistent, on every side, was wormwood to Millicent.

Photographs of Elinor appeared frequently in magazines and newspapers. Elinor, with her beautiful head thrown back, her lovely lips fairly appealing for kisses, her heavy lids half-veiling her luminous eyes. Elinor, with rich furs forming a background for her bare, beautiful shoulders. Elinor, in riding-costume, standing beside a thoroughbred at an entrance to the Park. Elinor, in smart sports attire, stepping into a high-powered car. (Millicent wondered jealously if Tony had given it to her.)

Elinor, after a concert, her arms full of roses from her admirers, en route to the City Hospital's children's ward, looking like a madonna. Elinor, in a demure, befrilled apron, presiding over a chafing-dish in the sunny bay-window of her apartment, the cardinal-birds in the cage over her head.

Tony tore up that last photograph, smiling wryly as he did so. Danelli, scanning it over a perfect breakfast, prepared by his perfect maid, thought of Elinor's tea and shuddered.

It was in May that bill-boards between Baltimore and Washington announced the imminent appearance of Elinor in concert in the former city. It was later in May that Elinor sent for Tony.

This is a fine site for a garage, being on the main highway between Charlottetown and Montague.

The roads in these parts are being repaired, and I think special mention may be said of the road from Dr. Collins' Corner over the Murray Harbor Hill and out through Uigg, and Kinross. Much credit is due those men who thro' their untiring efforts are trying to bring our roads up to the standard.

The many friends of Mrs. Vernon Jenkins, Millview, are sorry to learn she met with an accident on Saturday, a cow having hooked her in the eye, which necessitated having a stitch put into it.
