Fortune's Apprentice
BY Leonard Leslie

For all that, the sisters met frequently. Diana liked to see Sandie and went to great pains to ensure that they were not left behind at such times. She made a point of being present, always. It was a motherly hen, and flattered herself that she was doing excellently at avoiding inconvenient situations she was certainly an expert.

In all this modest plotting she reckoned without the redoubtable Lady Eldrick. That astonishing personage was sharp in sizing up the situation, she had however to adopt a frontal attack before Philippa could be wrestled from maternal protection.

"Now," Lady Eldrick remarked when that result had been achieved, "I do not think it is a pleasant young man who used to make such a fuss of her, and then faded right out of the picture."

"How can you say such a thing?" "Rubbish my dear. You've been eating your heart out."

"I don't know what came between you, but I'm deadly like to unless there has been a tiff you would have gone scampering home weeks ago."

CHAPTER VIII
SISTERLY REVELATIONS

"You know I love being here with you, Auntie," remarked Diana to Lady Eldrick.

"Very flattering," the old lady restored. "But it seems odd to me to come to town and yet spend most of the day indoors listening to the wireless. Haven't you wireless at home?"

Diana laughed off her aunt's exaggerations, but Lady Eldrick's impression of the girl's behaviour was unchanged. "You can't deceive an old woman like me. You can't pull wool over my eyes."

To Philippa, Eldrick admitted that she didn't know what to make of Diana's behaviour. "Your sister has been moaning about like a lovesick calf," she added. "When that young man called she was full of beans. Jumping up and down almost with suppressed excitement. No, I won't say it was very suppressed, either. For a while after he went away she remained in high spirits. Then she just flopped all of a sudden. Never saw such a change."

"I think I know what is wrong," Philippa blurted out. "I will tell you all about it."

This War—Four Years Ago

HINTS ON ETIQUETTE
A gentleman will always give a woman the right of way, crossing behind her instead of dashing ahead of her, whether he knows her or not.

"Diana sighed. "You imagine things," she said somberly. Both of you imagine things. What is there to tell?"

"Quite a lot! Don't get me wrong. I have not the least intention of going my dear. What do you think I have brought you here for?"

"It was Father and Mother," Philippa said. "And Conrad. They had to interfere."

Diana stirred angrily. "There was nothing to interfere in."

"I'll leave that part to you. It is a fact, I assure you, that they thought it was time to be busy-bodies. On out-of-date lines, too. Almost a plot for a melodrama, though not quite so crude. They sent Conrad round to tell John Morris how impudent and anti-social it would be of him to aspire to marry the daughter of an Admiral."

"Aspire?" Diana muttered, almost humbly.

"Well, they didn't think it good enough for him to be friendly with the situation, the routine. They made it appear as though he would be taking a mean advantage by not giving you a chance to fall out of love with him."

"Philippa, this is going too far. Diana is dying to hear all about it. Oh no, it is not," Lady Eldrick exclaimed. "It seems to me an incredible situation for these days, and by no means a matter for the few people chiefly concerned in it."

"Please," Diana pleaded. "You was never anything between John and myself. I fall to see why so much fuss should be made because I was polite and friendly."

"Aren't you in love with him?" "You have no right to ask me."

Her aunt sported. "Come off it! I have every right. What you mean is that there had not been any acknowledged understanding. When I was a girl... Dear me, that shows I am nearing my dotage, doesn't it? Talking in that way my dears. Listen to me, Diana. I'll stick to the milkman's boy."

"His father is not a milkman."

"Never mind whether he is or isn't. There are ways of telling when two people have fallen in love whether they admit it openly or not. I watched you both. Gradually wasn't he put out of countenance when I accused him of keeping you on tenterhook?"

"That was just one more thing you ought not to have said, Auntie."

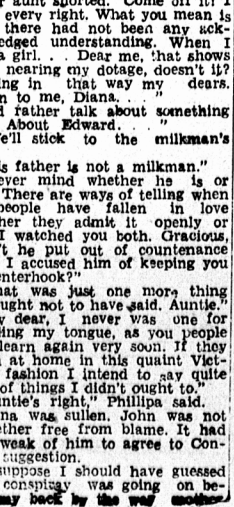

"My dear, I never was one for guarding my tongue, as you people may learn again very soon. If they go on at home in this quaint Victorian fashion I intend to say quite a lot of things I didn't ought to."

"Auntie's right," Philippa said. "I suppose I should have guessed some conspiracy was going on behind my back by the way another"

Photo above shows part of the great Burback Industrial Works at Saarbruecken, Germany, now undoubtedly wrecked, for the great war production city has been the target of many devastating Allied air attacks. Saarbruecken, capital and largest city of the Saar, lies in the heart of Germany's great coal and iron region, whose industries have been instrumental in keeping Germany's tanks, guns and bombers in action.
