The Unwilling Adventuress

BY MILDRED BARBOUR

CHAPTER 32. MARKING TIME.

The days slipped by, as days do beside the smiling Mediterranean, where the favored of Fortune come to play.

Doris—now the center of a gay, little group that could be found bathing of mornings in the smooth, surf, lurching at the smartest gathering place of the elect, tea-ing, playing tennis, motoring to Nice or Juan Les Pins, dancing each night at the Casino, tempting the Goddess of Chance at baccarat or roulette—was finding supreme enjoyment offered to her on a golden platter.

She almost forgot that she was in a precarious position, smiling dangerously under false pretenses that, at the first inkling of the truth, would plunge her into eternal social oblivion.

Hartley's family, all his whole acquaintance, had accepted her as his wife. She almost forgot that she was not his wife—and he and she were fostering a pretense which sooner or later might lead them into great difficulty.

But if she in her carefree way, forgot this, not so with Hartley. He dragged himself grimly through the routine provided for him. He had succeeded in winning a reputation for being a grouchy and jealous husband of a distractingly pretty wife.

"I really think that he's much more in love with Doris than she is with him," one of the girls of the crowd summed up the situation to her feminine conferees. "I've known Jack in Paris and New York, and he was never like this—so touchy and quiet. He was rather the life of the party in those days. Now he positively mopes."

"But you can't really blame Doris," another girl said, coming to her defense. "She doesn't flirt. She just naturally attracts men without any effort on her part. None of the gang can help being crazy about her."

"Poor Jack!" sighed the first girl. "Fiddlesticks!" scoffed the second. "If he's come a dropper with Doris, I dare say he richly deserves it. He looks like the sort of man who'd had tons of affairs and I'll bet he always came off victoriously before. So much the better if he has to crawl a little now."

All of which goes to show how far everyone was from guessing the truth about Doris and the man to whom she was supposed to be married—the man who clung obstinately to the image of Camilla Fielding and resented every minute of Doris's presence.

Or thought he did! As for Hartley's family, they were similarly and happily blind. Doris realized this with a distinct little pang, after a conversation she chanced to overhear from the little balcony of her private suite at the rear of the villa.

Hartley and his father were walking in the garden below; she heard the father saying: "I'll admit that at first I resented your marriage in that high and mighty fashion without telling me anything about it. But she's a sweet and lovely girl and you don't half deserve your luck. I only hope you're as much in love with her as you ought to be."

"You don't suppose I'd have married her otherwise, do you?" was young Hartley's quick but careful reply.

"I don't know," pursued his father as they strolled deeper into the perfumed garden. "I was a trifle doubtful at first. You're just the sort of chivalrous, young fool who'd marry a girl if you thought it was expected of you. But now, after watching you pretty closely for some weeks, I notice you never let her out of your sight. You look at her as if you thought someone was going to grab her away right under your eyes."

Doris turned her face into a sheltering cushion of the chaise longue where she was sunning herself, and shook with laughter.

How blind the poor, old darling was, she thought. How easily people deceived themselves into thinking what they wanted to think!

If Jack Hartley watched her, as his father said, it was not with devotion, but with anxiety. Just she betrays their true status and give a hint of the disgraceful hoax that together they had been forced to practice on his family, as a result of that first unfortunate step which concerned Camilla.

When she came downstairs half an hour before the dinner gong, Hartley, Sr., was alone in the shadowy drawing room where the lights were not yet lit. She knew what he wanted. Without waiting for his request, she seated herself at the piano and began to play and sing very softly, as befitted the twilight, the old familiar songs that were his favorites.

She had scarcely needed that chance conversation in the garden to convince her that she was accepted without reservation as a desirable daughter-in-law. The old fighter was not the sort to openly acknowledge surrender, but slowly and surely his first animosity had become undermined and finally had crumbled away. Now, he actually liked her.

It made her feel rather badly. She realized her false position too. Everything she thought with a sigh, had been much more easy when she believed that she was only tolerated by Hartley's family. She had always hoped rather vaguely that their resentment might prove the key to the awkward situation—through it, she and young Hartley could find an excuse for getting away and ending this ridiculous situation, which at any moment might become ac-

Stock Exchange Seats Mount in Price

NEW YORK, Dec. 15.—Financial men in Wall Street forecast a quarter of a million dollars as a future price tag for a seat in trade, dabble or what one will in the more than 2100 listed securities on the stock market.

Rockefeller-Morgan Profits.

John D. Rockefeller has a six hundred per cent profit on his membership. Few know that the old man has a seat on exchange. He is understood to have paid about $25,000 for his membership in 1883, but the oldest trader on the mart does not recall that Rockefeller has even as much as peeped inside the exchange building. His operations there have been conducted through others.

Sweetser Beats Grim Reaper

LOOKS FORWARD TO THE NEXT TITLE

ASHEVILLE, N. C., Dec. 15.—Jess Sweetser, second ranking American amateur golfer and the only American to ever capture the British amateur, after four months of complete rest in Asheville, N. C., is rapidly regaining the health he enjoyed before accompanying the Walker Cup team overseas last spring.

Sweetser, displaying perhaps the greatest nerve ever displayed on the golf links when he grimly disregarded strict orders of his physician and trudged wearily about the links in the final, spitting blood with almost every step, to so gallantly win the British amateur for the first time an American ever won the title, suffered a dangerous breakdown.

A complication of diseases, running from influenza and bronchitis to pneumonia, struck the gritty amateur golfer star while going overseas, but Sweetser, ignoring attending physicians and practically everybody else on the trip, refused to spend the trip overseas in a hospital. He took his bit into battle and emerged with one of the greatest achievements an American amateur ever registered on foreign soil.

Jess paid the price. His great victory even collected heavy interest from his manly physique. Upon returning to America he was ordered to Asheville to take a complete rest. Upon arrival at the North Carolina beauty spot, the mountainous golf courses at Billmore and Asheville Country clubs proved tantalizingly inviting to the famed amateur.

Regains Health.

At first he would merely shoot three or four holes a day. It was all he could stand. As the weeks wore along, Jess' boyhood face regained its healthy glow and the flush of youth commenced to burn his cheeks. Then he took a nine-hole jaunt every morning the weather permitting. Now Jess can make the eighteenth without pausing and the eighteen-hole round on either of the Asheville links is quite a piece of work, for both courses are uphill and down dale to a noticeable extent.

When the next national champion amateur is held Jess Sweetser unquestionably will be among those present. He was compelled to skip the 1926 national amateur—but Jess now is looking ahead to the 1927 event with boyish delight. "I hope to be better than ever," he says, "in shooting a smooth game these days, and taking just enough golf to keep me in perfect trim as to judge distance. Yes, if everything goes well, I will enter the next national amateur."
