The Mystery of the Singing Walls

A Detective Love Story By WILLIAM AVERILL STOWELL

"Burke, plainclothes men should not go in for such loud trussing," Graham remarked.

"The assistant stepped back out of the armor and grinned.

"That's all right, kid," Busby chuckled. "Well, rip that strip of leather from the inside of those leather high guards and lace them on the back of your rouser legs. Can you see the safe through the mask?"

"Sure," Burke declared. "I can see the whole room except the fireplace side behind me. That's what sets my goat. Are you sure there's no hiding place anywhere along here?"

"Believe me, I don't want that man jumping on my neck."

Busby walked up and down the fire place wall, tapping on the panels and sticking his tousled, mud-gray head up the yawning chimney.

"Don't worry, kid," he concluded. "Burke figure from its mail casing. The wall is a blank except for the door and the fireplace. And if a man opened the fire-damper enough to slide down, he would wake the dead. As for the door leading to the arcade, Osborn and the doctor will be right outside and will warn us if any one comes in that way."

Graham and I will be watching the entrance. The only other place a person could hide is in the wood-box, and you can see for yourself that it's chock full of logs. You're sure of your ground."

"Well, believe me, I want to be," Burke grumbled.

"You're all right kid," Busby slapped him on the back. "Now, find Jim, beat it, and come on over the roofs as fast as you can leg it. Mr. Osborn and the doctor will hold the fort till you show up. By the way, Osborn, here's your revolver. Be sure you and the doctor watch that safe like grim death."

As Burke and Busby followed Graham into the hall, John and Dr. Darnell stood for a while before the great hearth. The fire had died low and the embers were pink in the smoldering heap of gray ashes.

"It's a curious world, isn't it, Mr. Osborn?" the physician said meditatively. "One always wonders what mental twist could lead a man to do this."

"Still with all the modern emotions and desires of modern society," John objected, "the wonder is we don't all murder some one. Did you know Mr. Warburton well?"

"Although he was 70 and I am just 40, he was one of my warmest friends," the physician declared feelingly. "Since fifteen years ago when, as a young interne at St. Cecilia's Hospital, I helped care for his wife when she lost her only boy there in childbirth, both Mr. and Mrs. Warburton have taken an interest in me and their introductions to their friends laid the foundations of my present practice."

The two walked slowly over by the window-door and, throwing it open, stood just inside the threshold.

"Of course," John continued, "it looks as if either Hammond or Pratt, with a bare possibility of Higgins, committed this crime. But now that it could have been done by somebody standing on the arcade, the field of possibilities has been opened wide and it might have been some outsider who had a personal grudge against Mr. Warburton. Do you know, doctor, whether he had any enemies?"

"As I have already told the detectives," the physician declared, "Mr. Warburton has been attacked twice before. Certainly it seems logical that the man who attacked him before was probably responsible for his death. I don't believe the police have sufficiently realized the importance of this explanation, which would turn their thoughts entirely away from the people at present suspected."

"If what you say is correct, Higgins would certainly be out of the question," John remarked, "for he has been working for Mr. Warburton only a few months and the other attacks on him occurred long before he came here. But I don't see why Hammond Pratt would be eliminated for Mr. Warburton has had no use for them for many years."

"That is true," the doctor admitted, "and then again it might be a complete outsider who had a grudge. We must call the attention of Graham to this possibility. He seems to have a better grasp of the situation than that police officer. Here comes their man Burke."

Outside on the arcade a slight creaking sound fell on their ears, leading from the roof, a pair of elaborately checkered trousers gradually slipped into view.

A moment later the silent figure of Burke cautiously brushed by them and slid across the space before the fireplace.

For a time they could hear the rattling of the plates of the armor and the soft cursing of the detective as he strained to adjust the straps.

"Could you tell I was inside?" he whispered, as John left his companion and sauntered across the room.

The engineer walked slowly around the grotesque figure, critically examining it from all angles, peering into the set, staring devilish face, with the long, drooping mustaches. Through the holes for snapping marks he glimpsed Burke's

"Now I know you're inside, I can see your figure in spots," he answered, finally. "This Japanese armor doesn't cover you completely like the old fashioned coats of mail."

"To make sure, I will turn off all the lights except the table lamp. There!" Now you surely will pass muster."

The Singing Walls

"You people will be on the ar- cade behind the pillars, directly opposite the door, won't you?" Burke asked.

"Yes," John reassured him. "And we will slip along to the corridor, where Busby and Graham, and the engineer of us will break right in."

"All right," I shall move until I hear you coming," the assistant declared. "I have my gun, all right, and can use it; but I am a bit stiff bound up in this harness."

Stepping out on the arcade, John joined Dr. Darnell, and the two men continued along to the entrance into the long corridor. As they stopped on the threshold, Robert Pratt came running up the stairs.

"You're the man I'm after," he intoned, addressing himself to the physician. "Sis has hysterics. Please come down to her."

Over Pratt's shoulder the physician cast a questioning glance at John.

"That's all right," the engineer said. "I shall be glad to attend to that matter we were discussing. I can manage it all right alone."

Momentarily the doctor hesitated, standing by a nod of understanding, he followed the young man down the stairway.

For a time John stood just outside the door leading from the corridor to the arcade. Along the red marble floor the faint glow of the table lamp shone through the leaded panes of the tall French windows. All was still but for the roar of the theatre traffic pouring up the avenue in a steady stream.

Leaning against the railing, John drew his coat tightly around him, and his fingers closed on the weapon in his pocket. Presently a slight scraping made him turn his head, and the bulky figure of Busby loomed on the arcade.

"Where is Darnell?" Graham whispered, as he joined his colleague and the pair tiptoed along to the door.

"Mr. Hammond has been taken very ill," John explained. "Pratt came up here looking for the doctor. I motioned him to go down. I can manage all right alone because, from the angle at which I am standing now, I can watch both leading to the study. The doctor was really obliged to leave, captain, for, from the way Pratt spoke I guess Mrs. Hammond is in bad shape."

INSTITUTE PRESIDENTS

Following is the President's report of the Cardigan Women's Institute:

At our fifth Annual meeting, it is my privilege to give a short review of the work of our club during the past year.

Twelve regular and one special meetings were held with an average monthly attendance of twelve members, the total membership for the year being sixteen.

Our Institute began the year with the sum of $257.76 on hand and during the year increased the funds to $220.57 by means of a play in the month of May and a musical entertainment and social in September.

The Expenditure amounting to $124.61 was expended on furnishing with the financial aid of the school children, a durable fence and gates for the school grounds, owing to the work on the fence being delayed, our plans for beautifying the school grounds were not carried out very extensively. This I believe, would be a worthy project for the coming year.

Through the generosity of Mrs. MacNichol, the Annual Entrance Examination, presented to Miss Mary Donohoe, and a special prize presented to Malcolm Boherty Cardigan, who led the school in the Entrance Examinations.

We paid for having the piano in the Hall tuned twice during the year, and so other attention which it required.

A donation from members of our club was sent to the Red Cross Society. We paid for necessary work and erection of a flag-pole on the school grounds where the Union Jack floats proudly in honor of King and Country on each other's national holidays. There are some other minor expenses for instance, providing a double boiler for use of school children which, though a small donation provides a delicious cup of cocoa for our members during the moon lunch hour.

A finished quilt was sent to Mr. Herbert Orphanage and work on an autograph quilt was begun, which I do not doubt, will be finished during the coming year.

A detailed account of such exercises will appear in the Secretary-Treasurer's report.

Some interesting and instructive papers supplied by the Department were read during the year—thus making our meetings very enjoyable.

Miss Windsor, the Assistant Supervisor, was present at our June meeting. She gave a very interesting account of the Annual Convention. This was followed by a splendid demonstration on "Cakes and Icings."

While congratulating ourselves on our progress and success, we might at the same time ask ourselves "What of the future?" Let us learn to look upon every tomorrow as a new adventure and we will accomplish things. We cannot stand still and live and we cannot go back. We must remember the sunshine of yesterday and fertilize every effort until it blossoms. There is much for us to do. Many avenues of work open up before us. But above all we must have loyalty to our club, what we can do for the betterment of school and community conditions. The Institute mother should co-operate with her children in their School Fairs by impressing upon them the importance of making an honest effort. "But try, the trying shall suffice. The aim if reached or not, makes great life."

Let us strive for greater membership during the coming year. "Union of purpose in the work of improving 'Home and Country' is where our strength lies."

In retiring from Presidency, I wish to cordially thank the members who have entertained us during the past year. The Secretary-Treasurer who worked for us during the year, the officers and members of our club, and last but not least the Dramatic Club who labored so earnestly on our behalf during the early months of 1925.

Let us make use of every moment in cementing those bonds which are binding us together in the work of improving conditions in the rural districts of this beloved Canada of ours.

Respectfully submitted, Maisie MacDonald.

PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS NEW DOMINION WOMEN'S INSTITUTE

Fellow Members:—

As our Institute year terminates and as we pause to review its history, I believe that I am voicing the opinion of all present when I say that there has been nothing to regret and much to commend.

We began our Institute work at a considerable disadvantage in that our membership was very small, and consequently the fees amounted to a trifling sum, and we had little with which to meet the necessary expenditure entailed in carrying on our work. However, on glancing at our Financial Statement this evening I have found that the cash on hand at present amounts to no mean sum, and our financial standing, is I believe, higher than we hoped to find it. That is indeed encouraging, not only to ourselves, but it has stimulated other Institutes to greater efforts.

But it is not even the growth of our funds, small in comparison with the growth of the spirit of friendship and loyalty which is so necessary in the carrying on of all successful united work, and which pervades our meetings in such a marked degree that I really think that the Women's Institute does better work than any other organization in the line of bringing together people of all classes, and creeds, and appealing to all.

We are all interested in the advancement of education, for we realize that much of the future greatness of our country depends upon the intelligence of its people; and it is generally known that the Women's Institute is a very important part in educational work. It aids and encourages both teacher and pupils, and promotes a very desirable community spirit. I am sure we have all found our meetings profitable and enjoyable and that we intend to have them still more so during the coming Institute year.

We often say that a man does not receive praise from his neighbors until the day of his funeral, but I am not going to postpone my praise of each and all of our members for the splendid way in which each carried on her work. Not once has gloom or discouragement entered our little field, but we have worked with confidence and courage, and I am sure that we feel amply repaid.

In closing I wish to thank you for the support you have given me during this, our first Institute year, and to remind you that the outlook for next year is extremely bright. Let us, then, renew our efforts and continue the work that has been so well begun.

Mrs. George A. Wilson, President, New Dominion W.I.

YOUNG WOMEN SUFFER MOST

These Two Found Relief by Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Ayer's Cliff, Quebec.—"I have been teaching for three years, and at the end of the year I always feel tired and have no energy left. I was a awful sick each month, too, having pains in my back until sometimes I was obliged to stop working. A friend recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to me and I heard many women telling how good it was so I thought it would help me. And it did. Now I take six bottles every year and recommend it to others." DONALDA FANTEUX, Ayer's Cliff, Quebec.

"Unable to Work" Canning, Nova Scotia.—"I had irregular periods and great suffering at those times, the pains causing vomiting and fainting. I was teaching school and often for some hours I would be unable to attend to my work. Through an advertisement in the papers I knew of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and it has been of great benefit to me, the troubles being completely relieved." LAURA J. EATON, Canning, King's County, Nova Scotia.

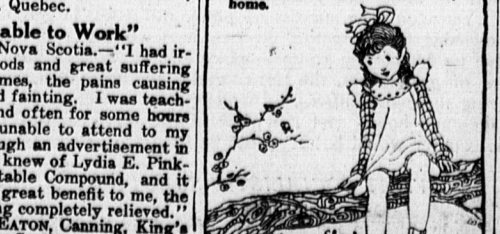

EMILY sat on a low branch of the plum tree. The sun was warm and many of the plum-blossoms were open. The bees had found them, and were busy gathering the flowers' gold-dust.

Emily liked to listen to their wing-song.

One bee came to the flowers on Emily's bench. She sat very still to watch him.

"Why! He carries a basket on both back legs," she said. "And this is the market where he gets his groceries."

When his baskets were full, Mr. Bee went humming on his way home.
