That Body of Yours

By James W. Barton, M.D.

THESE ARE ALWAYS SOME CAUSE FOR INDIGESTION

Among the commonest conditions of which patients complain is indigestion. There is no use trying to tell a patient that his indigestion is caused by mental or emotional disturbances unless a complete or thorough examination is made by test meals and by X-rays. And even in cases where no possible cause can be found for the indigestion, years later a real or organic cause is often found.

When patients go the Mayo Clinic for examination and treatment, in most cases they have been examined and treated elsewhere and finally go to the Mayo Clinic as a last resort.

Drs. D. L. Wilbur and J. H. Mills of the Mayo Clinic, in the Annals of Internal Medicine, record their study of 354 patients who after examination at the Mayo Clinic were told that their indigestion was functional or nervous, that is, not due to any organic trouble. These cases were examined about seven years later and it was found that real trouble, not nervous or functional—was present in about one in six cases. Most cases being due to ulcer of the stomach or intestine or to inflammation of the gall bladder.

Other conditions found which were causing the indigestion in some cases were heart disease, hardening of the arteries, kidney stone, pernicious anemia, tuberculosis, and syphilis.

The point then is that in the case of a patient suffering with indigestion from no apparent cause, his indigestion must not be considered of the nervous or emotional type unless a complete examination is made and a full history of the case has been well considered. If the Mayo Clinic can be wrong in one of every six or seven cases, it shows how watchful
