The Female Insurance Agent.
"The life insurance agent of the male persuasion is a phenomenon we had got hardened to. A few harsh words or a threat of personal violence will usually remove this drawback from the premises, but now that the job is being taken up by ladies, we shall have to reconsider our position," says a writer in "Pick-Me-Up." "The life insurance business seems to develop conversational abilities to a remarkable extent, to judge from the gentlemen with whom I have discussed the matter occasionally. And if, on the top of woman's natural gift for speaking, she cultivates a profession that makes even quiet men aggressively talkative, she will hardly find time enough in the usual office hours to unload her mind of the weight there is upon it. I think we shall have to keep a tame mouse on the premises for our protection, as I understand that this is a remedy that never fails. The lady will just have started on the stereotyped observation that in the midst of life we are in debt, or something of that sort, and then our tame mouse will climb up out of the waste-paper basket and trot serenely towards the scene of the trouble. Unless the efficacy of the time-honored remedy has been greatly exaggerated, we ought to be able to clear the decks, so to speak, in about two minutes. The life insurance lady will, so to speak, gird up her loins and depart with a pathetic howl, and we shall feel glad to think that she has been removed from the premises without regrettable violence."
