BROKEN WINGS

by Barbara Webb

CONTINUED
SUPPER

Bill's sand map fascinated Kitty. Somehow it made her understand, as nothing else had, the hopelessness of their situation. Two little dots on a tiny dot in a great ocean. She looked at it for a long time, unaware that Bill had gone for water, that he had hunked one of the coconuts and placed it on a large green leaf at her side.

"Here goes our first fire," he cried hoping to rouse her from her spathy. "See." He struck one of the preclous matches, the kindling flared up. The heat burned Katherine's cheek and she moved hastily backward.

"Now for the clams." Bill laid the shells over the coals and Katherine watched while the shells slowly opened, revealing the clams sizzling in their own liquor.

"They smell good." Katherine forced herself to say.
"Don't they? I hope they taste good. I've eaten 'em this way in Florida. Down there they claim it's the healthiest way in the world to serve clams."

The fire died down as quickly as it had flared up. Very gingerly Bill fished the roasted clams from the coals. "Let them cool a minute," he directed. "Let's take a swig of this cocconut juice first." He punctured two eyes of the cocconut and poured a thin stream of the sweetish milk into the thermos cup and offered it to Katherine.

She took it obediently and made a wry face over it.
"Drink it all," he commanded. "It will do you good. Might as well get used to it, it will have to be coffee, tea and champagne for us for a while."

Somehow she managed to swallow it. Then he took the cup, poured in his portion and drank his share.
"Wouldn't be at all bad, would it?" he commanded. "Now for the clams."

The clams were delicious and Katherine felt better when the simple meal was over. Bill wacked and gouged at the cocconut until he got part of the shell off and some of the meat pried out.

"Have some dessert!" he advised Katherine. The milky white flesh was sweet and fresh. Katherine enjoyed it. Between them they managed to finish most of the cocconut, then Bill covered the remaining pieces with a big leaf. "Fruit for breakfast," he remarked.

Katherine pulled out her cigarette case. "Have one?" she asked.
Bill shook his head. "Nope. I don't care particularly for them. Fliers don't smoke a great deal as a rule. I like a pipe best when I do smoke. Say, I found some chocolate, about three or maybe four big bars of it, but I thought I'd save it for some big occasion, birthday party for one of us, something like that."

Katherine nodded, enjoying her smoke. Darkness fell swiftly around her.

them, the soft early impenetrable darkness of the tropics. Stars swam into place. The embers of the fire glowed softly. The man and woman sitting in their faint light were silent, each busy with his own thoughts.

Bill roused himself at last. "About sleeping tonight, I thought you might take the flying suit for a matrix and use the sheepskin packet for a cover. We'll scoop out some kind of hollow in the sand near the fire. I'll stay awake for a while and keep it going. I don't think there are any animals around, no big ones anyway, but I don't want to be surprised. You turn in any time you like."

Katherine made no answer. She was listening, nerves on edge, for the noises of the night. Insects attracted by the fire buzzed noisily. In the distance some night bird was calling. There was a faint far off drumming sound, the origin of which she could not guess. The night wind, rising in the hollow, moaned in her ears. The water lapped monotonously. Never had she been so alone. She shivered.

"Let's get you tucked in," Bill suggested.
He rose, but she did not offer to help him. A large beetle blundered near her hair and she screamed.
"Nothing but a bug," he said calmly.

While she watched he scooped out a hollow in the sand, making it so that the wind would not blow smoke toward her. He spread the flying suit in the hollow, arranging it with care. He folded the sheepskin jacket at the hollow's foot.

"Tomorrow we'll have to make some kind of shelter, I think we can build some makeshift huts, using the sides of the Falcon for one wall. Say, we ought to give this island a name, don't you think?"

Katherine was touched by his consideration. "I suppose we should," she said more kindly than she had spoken before.

"Something nice and cheerful like 'Horrible Landing,' or 'Sandy Crutch,' or 'Lookout-for-the-rocks,'" Bill said laughing.

"Why not just call it Broken Wings," Katherine ventured.
"Broken Wings—not bad, I like that," Bill was pleased. "Now you tuck yourself in. I'm going to walk down to the water and see if there's any sign of a ship. They carry lights at night and if one went past we'd be more apt to see it than in the daytime, I believe."

Katherine huddled into her improvised bed. But she could not sleep. The night was full of terror. Every nerve, softened by delicate living, shrieked for comfort. Even the fire with its soft hissing was a menace. It brought the insects. A beautiful moth flew suddenly out of the night and, even as Katherine admired its bright-colored wings, blundered too near and singed itself on the coal.

Katherine shrieked. She heard Bill run toward her over the sand. His anxious face made her feel ridiculous.

"It's nothing," she assured him. "Just a silly moth that fell into the fire. My nerves are all jumpy anyway. Maybe a shot of that brandy is what I need."

Bill hesitated. "I hate to say no, if you really want it. But I do think we ought to save that for some real emergency."

ness, chafed at its unfairness. Not once did she feel a sense of thankfulness for the miracle of their escape unharmed, from the wreck. Nor did she give a thought to the skill, functioning automatically, that had lifted them over the rock, saved their lives. She grew more and more morose. Sleep did not come.

Bill for his part now regretted not having given her the brandy it might have soothed her on this first trying night. He peered at her. Apparently she was asleep now. He hoped she was. His own bones ached from weariness. He threw another log, a big one that he had been saving for this time, on the coals. Then, stretched full length on the sand, he fell into deep and dreamless slumber.

When Katherine was sure he slept she raised herself on one elbow, and across the coals regarded him long and earnestly. He would expect her to work. He would ask her to share the making of the hut he had spoken of. She knew that, well, she wasn't going to do it. She hated him. She hadn't really wanted that brandy, but she did want her own way. She had always had her own way. She was going to do it. She hated him. She was tired of self-pity filled her eyes. She was alone, on a desert island, with the one human being whom she loathed and hated with all the force of her being.
