tween the Bench and Bar were not such as either could congratulate themselves upon. The judge was snappish and overbearing, and, in more than one instance, insultingly rude, the counsel appeared thorough-going and received the harsh reproofs of the judge with meek humility. Where, I asked myself in the much vaunted independence of these men? . . . During the progress of the trial, one of the juniors took exception to the admission of some evidence. The judge listened quietly to his arguments, which lasted only a few moments, and then addressing him with about the same respect that is generally paid by an ill-natured man to his dog, ordered him to sit down. . . . "I have no wish to discuss this matter further. I have learned all, and more, than I wanted to know, and am convinced that the 'talk' generally indulged in, over the dinner table, of the independence of the Bar, is mere clapnetrap."—Q.C.

(Broad-Axe, February 28, 1871)

"The office seekers, who fawn upon the Premier and his political associates, are opposed to our outspoken utterances upon public men and measures. . . . The electors of this Colony never intended that the present coalition should rule them. . . . Already the people of this Colony have had a trial of the . . . as rulers, and the result of their way was such that it was not inaptly termed 'the reign of terror.' Honest men despise political tricksters who, when previously in power, were continually getting up delegations to send themselves around the world to 'chase butterflies'—at the people's expense, and who squandered the public money on troops, constables, whiskey and jobbery." (Broad-Axe, May 30, 1871)

One would be of the opinion that in view of all we have read in 'The Broad-Axe' against the doings of certain politicians that the writers of these criticisms would, on attaining power, exercise a different attitude towards such actions they so piously denounced, but, alas! for the frailty of human nature, such lofty sentiments in speech (in the opinion of many today) did not materialize in action, either here or at Ottawa, notwithstanding the opportunities offered.

"On Dit. That the onerous duties of the Militia Department have not been fully recognized by the Government. Over 500 General Orders having been issued during the past year. . . . A special grant for the 'do nothing' branch of the Service is about to be voted." (Broad-Axe)

"On Dit. That next summer pasture on the public squares will be free to the friends of the corporation." (Broad-Axe)

"Parties wishing to kick up a row on the streets will be good enough to select a place at a proper distance from the Police Office, so as not to disturb the slumbers of the policemen at the station." (Broad-Axe)

"I think it improves a comic paper to have a joke in it once in a while." (Artemus Ward)

"Personalities. Some of our local papers, for want, we suppose, of something better to do, are busily engaged in discussing each other's merits, or rather, demerits. One editor's garments are criticized with the skill and ability of a connoisseur; another man's business transactions are made the text for an abusive paragraph or two; and a third is told that some of his relations are no better than they ought to be. . . . Of what possible interest can this be to the general reader? The public acts of public men are public property, and they afford ample scope for legitimate criticism, but when personalities of the lowest kind come to be the pastime of editors, the press loses influence and ceases to be true to its high mission. Whether a man is six feet high or only four feet six; whether his beard is red or black; whether he rises late or early; . . . all these things are of no public utility, and never discussed except by lovers of gossip and retailers of scandal. These things have no bearing upon the land questions the railway or Confederation. . . . They are beneath the dignity of journalism and should be avoided." (Broad-Axe May 13, 1871)

The foregoing extract reminds me of one of Artemus Ward's pen portraits of a journalist in his home town who was inclined towards personalities when writing about his rival journalist across the street, in which the controversy was about a plank road: "The road may be, as our contemporary says, a humbug, but our saint isn't bald-headed, and we haven't got a one-eyed sister Sal." (A. Ward)

SOURIS NOTES

The play "Climbing Roses" was presented in B. I. S. Hall on the 21st by the Souris Dramatic Club to a large and appreciative audience. Laughter and drama were so cleverly blended by the characters that they kept the interest of the audience keen every moment during the entertainment.

Great credit is due Mr. L. L. Cheverie who so successfully trained the actors and actresses. The members of the cast which are as follows, all performed their parts splendidly:—Mrs. Warren, a social autocrat—Mrs. Walter Cheverie. Joyce Belmont, a hothouse orchid—Miss Ethel Hughes. Maggie Rose, from an old fashioned garden—Mrs. A. T. McDonald. Jim Rose, Maggie's husband—James Brennan.

Peggy Rose, all that the name Rose implies—Miss Alice LeVie. Dryden Frooms everything but a shrinking violet—J. D. McIntyre. Hazel Somers—Miss Margaret Brennan. Priscilla Prentice an uptight dandelion—Miss Lillian Crossman. Winnie Clarke, a rambler and a pest—Miss Eileen Paquet. Jack Archer (alias Watson)—Ivan Cheverie.

Ferdie Wimbledien—Brenton St. John. Percy Southworth—Harold LeVie. Messrs. James O'Hanley and Jack Brennan also played minor parts in the play.

During the first intermission Miss McInnis of Charlottetown gave a solo dance which was heartily enjoyed. A chorus of six little girls dressed in Dutch costumes sang very nicely in a motion song and were also encored.

The second intermission Miss Mary LeVie and Miss Margaret Burns sang very acceptably "Bashful Dan and Giggling Ann." Miss Isabella Mooney gave a reading and the junior chorus of six girls again came on the stage dressed in their unique costumes and gave "Mamma's Little Honeyes."

Miss Pearl McKenzie who was pianist for the evening taught the junior six and she is to be congratulated upon the wonderful success she made.

The Souris Chorus consisting of seven instruments was in attendance and rendered several selections. The entertainment was brought to a close with the singing of the National Anthem. The nice sum which was realized goes toward the new memorial window for St. Mary's Church in honor of those who lost their lives in the Great War.

Income from Sweden's State railways has materially increased in the last 12 months.

Central Guardian Seasonable Hints To Sheep Growers

Sheepmen should at this time of year recall some of the disappointments of the last shipping season and attempt to avoid their repetition. Perhaps the most common losses in returns are from lack of finish, and the presence of lambs in the shipments. This, of course, does not apply so much to the early market as lambs then are generally forced along for weight and the cut of bucks has not yet gone into effect.

For the fall trade, however, can be done now to guard against these handicaps and help create the same time a reputation for quality in lambs such as is already enjoyed by so many agricultural products of this Island.

And best of all, what is not the case, very little actual expense is necessary to get these results. It is chiefly a question of careful planning and attention to the things at the right time. The raising of all grade male lambs for pure bred stock intended for breeding should be done at from 10 days to two weeks of age. This is a dangerous operation and involves scarcely any risk of loss.

Docking of all lambs, whether breeding or market purposes, is important. It helps to complete the blocky outline of a good market animal, which counts for more than is often thought in selling. It eliminates the dirty mats which, unsightly, and sometimes cause a blow or maggots. Docking is done at the age previously recommended for castrating. With lambs both operations may be performed in the one handling, thus saving a few days of the lamb's life before docking.

The matter of economical finishing of lambs in the fall months is chiefly to providing a suitable artificial pasture crop. For this purpose one of the best and easiest half acre of this crop will make a big difference to the ordinary farmer as everywhere demonstrated the value of rape to their satisfaction, and it should be grown widespread try-out here. Sheep Club Secretaries can all give information about this seed and other club members.

Another important item too often neglected, is dipping. This should be performed soon after shearing of the lambs giving particular attention as they usually carry a large proportion of the ticks at that time. Further information on these other phases of sheep raising and marketing, will be gladly supplied by the local Live Stock Branch, Charlottetown. Demonstrations of castrating and docking can be arranged for on request.

There had been a robbery in village, and the local constabulary, enjoying the privileges of their position. "Madam," he said to the burgled mansion, "just everything to me and we'll follow by the heels in no time. Can you remember which night was you fancied you could be man in the grounds?" "I can't remember," wailed unhappy woman. "I was driven unnervered at the time. All I remember is that I was in my bedroom. The policeman raised his hat. "Excellent, madam!" he said. "That is sufficient. I have 10-11 Saturday night!"

The new fashion in London wear jewels on the back, and ten brooches under the left shoulder blade.

Miss Ethel Renton, Charlottetown spent the week end with friends Summerside.
