The Suprioting Sanctuary

By Leslie Cargill

Bang, bang, bang, bang, bang bang, bang, seven more shots scattered from Everard's pistol. Martin and Elendorf were firing with greater care. The firing-pin clicked harmlessly "Empty" Hugh reported.

CHAPTER XV A FREE-LANCE FIGHTER

There is a grimness about a peace-lover driven to fighting. A man slow to anger, makes a powerful opponent when he is roused. Now that trouble had invaded Hugh Everard's retreat, he was filled with righteous indignation.

tackled, providing a score was prevented. Hugh was in agony from cramp in his side. Every pausing breath brought searing pain.

"I'm done—I'm done—I'm done," he reiterated. "Helping hands were under his elbows. 'Leave me' he gasped. All he wanted was to be allowed to lie down with knees doubled up. Death and oblivion would be welcome relief from the cramp which tied his internal organs into knots.

FLAG OF TRUCE

Twenty minutes later a single man approached waving a white handkerchief. Only Elendorf understood his coarse dialect, though Hugh, who had a slight acquaintance with German, made out sufficient to know that the crew were prepared to come to terms with their commander on conditions which he declined to accept.
