COLORS OF OCEAN WATERS

More often than not the color of the sea would be described as green. The heavy seas that wash over the deck of a ship in a storm are green. Sea green is usually conceived as a faint bluish green. Sometimes, again the sea is gray, and often it is correctly described as blue, more especially when reference is made to the Mediterranean, writes Captain Wilmet P. M. Russell in Chambers' Journal.

The White Sea is associated with gray polar skies and ice. The Red Sea doubtless derives its name from the thick, wall-like masses of coral fringing the cleft by which the waters of the Indian Ocean advance through the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb. These coral reefs are of red and purple hues, and below the surface of the water are coralline forests.

The Black Sea was originally known to the ancients as the Inhospitable Sea. There is something sinister in the old name, which suggests storm-tossed waves, reflecting black skies. The Yellow Sea is tinged with the loess borne down by the Yellow river. Most rivers in China are yellow once they reach the plains. Like the River Thiber, though among the hills they are green and clear. In the eyes of poets and musicians the Danube is blue, but the prosaic traveller would be more likely to describe it as greenish gray.

If we try to eliminate the color which is imparted to water by extraneous factors, such as reflection and transparency, and to investigate what is the inherent color of water, we are faced with the difficulty that water, generally speaking, is contaminated with foreign matter. Where can water be sought in its natural purity? Nowhere are all taints in the melted snow which flows off a glacier at a high altitude in the Alps.

Such snow can gather no impurity from the atmosphere, nor can it be affected either by vegetable or mineral matter, for the former is practically non-existent and the latter being buried deep under the ice and snow, cannot impregnate the surface snow which melts in the sunbeams. When we examine a lake in the Alps which is filled with water flowing directly from such a glacier stream, we find that the color of the water, if it is of any depth, is deep blue, and moreover, such color will be consistently maintained, no matter what may be the hue of the sky above or of the underlying bed of the lake. In the ice grottoes of glaciers the color of the ice is of the loveliest blue.

From this, Captain Russell concludes that the natural color of pure water in volume is blue: This will be borne out by the Lake of Geneva, which is for the most part filled with glacier snow water, and is one of the deepest blue; and the River Rhone, which flows out of this lake, is of the same color until it is changed by the contamination of tributaries, whose water comes from less pure sources. Such contamination, when it is of vegetable nature, tends to change the color of the water to grass green.

The salt in the sea, which is naturally white, seems to have no effect upon the color of water. The greenness of the sea is in the main due to vegetable matter, and in proportion as it is less impregnated with such matter the sea tends to become more blue.

Tenament Houses Two Centuries Ago

WASHINGTON, July 18.—(C.P.)—Out in the Mesa Verde National Park of Colorado are ruins of an apartment house that was occupied for two centuries. The Interior Department estimates tenancy began in 1073 and lasted until 1272, or just about the period of the crusades in Europe. Tenants were the cliff-dwelling Indians and what is left of their home now is known as the Cliff Palace.

The place contains 200 dwelling rooms and 23 sacred rooms, rising at some points as high as four stories and extended 300 feet along rocky ledges. It is believed the cave in which Cliff Palace was constructed was inhabited by agricultural Indians as far back as 1,000 B. C.
