

Annual Meeting of Y Grads Club

The annual business meeting of the Y Grads Club was held Wednesday evening at Old Spain Blue Room with President Jim Cudmore in the chair. The Treasurer's report, read by Syd Green, showed that the sum of $2305.00 had been donated for various charitable purposes in the city, including the YMCA Building Fund, Firemen's Fund, YMCA Holland Cove Camp, Larkin Fund, Red Cross and others.

No, Mr. Brown

By Gertrude Knevel CHAPTER VII

There were other reasons than her protegee's good luck and the progress of certain deep laid match-making designs to raise April's spirits that bright morning. The good news about Zora and Polly had come on top of a telephone message from the Barter Shop saying the Chippendale chairs had been sold—and for a hundred and fifty apiece. The purchaser was a collector of antiques, the proprietor explained. It seemed a vague description, but April did not ask further about the person who was rich enough—or crazy enough—to pay so large a sum. Three hundred dollars! That meant that when the Barter Shop commission was paid and the check sent to Ten, she would have seventy dollars for herself for new clothes. Seventy? Did she need all that? Couldn't fifty be stretched to provide the new suit and hat she needed so desperately? Then there'd be ten for the Gilligan children's shoes and ten for Granny Moucher's little winter comferts—not forgetting peppermint! It was so long since April had had the smallest sum to play with that she enjoyed pondering financial adjustments. The loss of her job had been a blow but still, as she moved down the dark hall, she rejoiced to be free of this dismal abode of clacking typewriters, jangling phones, and hard luck tales. April in fact was in holiday mood this morning. In love with the world—the world in general—not the tall young man waiting at the foot of the staircase.

LONDON — (CP) — More than 25,500,000 books were issued to borrowers by public libraries in London during 1947.

April giggled in behind the wheel, dropping her last bundle. Bill picked the bag of buns from the gutter but held on to it. "Forgive me," he said quickly. "Honestly, April, about that chap in there, I've had my men out after him for some time. They haven't been able to catch him so I had to try myself. I can't think why you should want to defend such a—"

"I wasn't defending the wretched man! I was just getting even with you for putting me in wrong over there at the office. Miss Gpoe, you know, and—"

"It isn't the Gpoe women you're mad about, it's because I kissed you. Do you deny it?"

"Of course I don't deny it," April was scowling. "You don't expect me to say I liked it, do you?"

"Perhaps not quite yet," Bill sighed. The annoyance in his eyes was melting to a twinkle. "So my kiss mattered, did it, April Glory?"

When April returned to her car, she found Bill waiting for her. "Do you realize," he cried, "what you have done? That fox was just going to cash my ten-dollar grocery order—a thing that's absolutely against rules. He would have swiped two dollars for himself and given me the rest to get drunk on. Much he would have cared about my sick wife and three small children!"

"Well, I'm not worrying about them, either. I think they're frightfully fortunate not to exist."

"I think it's a good thing you're out of social work," April said. "You're perfectly right. Mr. Brown," she acknowledged stiffly. "I am very glad indeed to be out of social work. For one thing, it makes me have to come in contact with such peculiar people."
