MAIL COURIER REMEMBERED —A very enjoyable evening was spent at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Williams, North River, when the York Point and North River boxholders assembled to show their appreciation to their mail courier, Nelson Williams. At nine o'clock, they all proceeded to the livingroom where Mr. Wesley Bell read an address, and Mr. Andrew MacEachern presented Nelson with a well-filled purse. Nelson in this way thanked the people very kindly and then they bounced him to the ceiling singing "For He's A Jolly Good Mail Driver". The rest of the evening was spent in games and dancing, music being furnished by Francis Doyle in his usual good style. Lunch was served by the hostess, assisted by ladies present. In the wee small hours of the morning they departed to their respective homes knowing they had an excellent evening and wishing Nell more years of mail driving. — (Patriot Please Copy).

DOROTHY DIX SAYS—

ANSWER: I presume that the matter of changing the girl's name from her father's to her stepfather's could easily be arranged, but you would have to consult a lawyer about that. However, inasmuch as the girl is 20 and is almost sure to change her name to a husband's name in a few years, why bother about it? It is perfectly all right for her to call her stepfather "Dad" if it pleases him.

DEAR DOROTHY DIX: Is there anyway for the Alcoholics Anonymous to help my husband when he claims that his drinking is justified. Of course, his real reason is that he doesn't want to quit the habit. He is a fine and capable man and could make a success if he would only let liquor alone.

MRS. C. G. L.

ANSWER: There is no way of reforming a man who doesn't want to be reformed, so I am afraid your husband's case is hopeless.

Ellen's Diary

By an Island Farmer's Wife

ingly in curls, while mine with no motherly attempt at all to "gild the lily" was plaited lightly by expert and kindly fingers and "not flying all over the place, Ellen."

The time was a lovely Summer afternoon, and the occasion a gala one to me, a birthday party for the girl twins at the manse at the corner near "home." The same manse still sits there, though the years may have lent enchantment to my memory of it. Perhaps odd trees are missing from the surroundings now and the balcony that once was above the verandah on more than one side has been torn away since then. In any event there are differences I now find, as, of course, only rarely in these later years, I come to the little old church there to worship. The minister was a Scotsman "just out," small in stature but exceedingly "fervent in spirit." When I read "The Little Minister" I was reminded at once of this man among the number who came and went there with the changing years. His wife was an educated and nice lady and it was whispered at the time among the brisk and capable ladies of the community, with accompanying looks of amazement: "her bread, dear its' awful and mind you she never set bread in her life 'till she came here?" coming from a city in the old land she had never needed this accomplishment. And one who "wouldn't have believed it, if she hadn't seen it: with her own two eyes" was present on "a Saturday night tea" when she was dressing a chicken for the Saw-beth's dinner. "And feathers, my dear—I shouldn't be saying the like, but there was a track of them from the kitchen right through to the parlor." Even from such criticism, one never has any idea that perhaps at the time some of the seed of it is falling on good ground. I never approach the arrival of Sunday at an earthy task but I feel I am breaking a jaw.

Nor do I clean and fix up a fowl or such, but that I do it neatly. And the bread. There was no need of such common and every-day fare at a children's party. I still can recall the flaky pastries, the bewitching cookies, and the wonderful birthday cake and the eagerness with which we searched our portions in hope of finding one of the fortune-telling tokens concealed therein. And there was also a generous lunch done up in a beautiful paper napkin for me to carry to the "ither wees ones at home."

The near-to-proposal? Oh of course. That then—and it is strange indeed how with the years ones ideas may change!—was the one fly in the ointment, the thorn on the rose-stem of my day. There were the two sons: Geor-die and Ber-r-tie. Geordie was the better looking, though the two were, I should say, bright little fellows. Bertie was howev't the counterpart of his father so small and neat. He it was who seized a favorable opportunity doubtless excited by the happiness of the day, when there was a lull in our games to ask me: "Ellen, will you be my gir-r-?" I recall now my own inability to reply at the moment and the smart steps that hastened me away from the scene. I remember too the strategy it took afterwards to avoid meeting his eyes, and the satisfaction I experienced when finally he moved no to another manse. Life is interwoven with the carefree joys and the tragic and embarrassing moments of our earlier years. And the girl twins at the manse, to this James of the past, while James quite so prettily as then, though the years may have lent enchantment to my memory of it. Perhaps odd trees are missing from the surroundings now and the balcony that once was above the verandah on more than one side has been torn away since then. In any event there are differences I now find, as, of course, only rarely in these later years, I come to the little old church there to worship.
