SUGAR RATIONED: NEED MORE HONEY

(Experimental Farm News) Because of sugar rationing every pound of honey that can be produced is urgently needed, consequently beekeepers in Canada are being urged to work their bees and equipment to the utmost capacity.

The main sources of honey in Canada are Alsike, White Dutch and Sweet Clovers. Although the major portion of the honey crop comes from the clovers, a great amount of it is secured from those that grow under natural conditions along roadsides and on uncultivated land, says C. B. Gooderham, Dominion Apiarist. Usually the cultivated crops are cut for hay before they finish blossoming, so that the flow of nectar is practically stopped and the possible honey crop reduced. Under natural conditions, however, the clovers will continue to blossom until late autumn so the flow of nectar is uninterrupted over a longer period and the honey increased. This is particularly true of sweet clover. It is estimated that under suitable weather conditions for nectar secretion 1 acre of clover allowed to blossom normally will yield from 1 to 200 pounds of honey.

Just now there is an abundance of clover of all kinds growing along roadsides and on uncultivated land which, if allowed to bloom would add many thousands, perhaps mill ions of pounds to the honey crop of Canada. In order that this potential crop of food may be secured it is hoped that in any region where cutting the vegetation along roadsides and on waste land is practiced an effort will be made to leave standing as much of the clover as possible.

An organ grinder and his donkey who can be found every Friday in Northfields Avenue, West Ealing, London, were left the equivalent of a great amount of it is secured from those that grow under natural conditions along roadsides and on uncultivated land, says C. Steinbeck Hears Sergeant Tell of Cottage That Wasn't There

American Soldier Sees Cozy Scene in Home That Blitz Destroyed, and Is Disturbed Because He Doesn't Believe in Stuff Like That

Special to the New York Herald Tribune and Charlotte Town Guardian. Copyright 1943.

By John Steinbeck

LONDON. — The sergeant lay in the grass and pulled grass and hit off the tender stems and chewed them. It was Sunday, and a number of people were lying about, sailors and soldiers and even a few civilians. Across the path a line of people were fishing in the Serpentine, sitting on rented chairs, fishing in water that was stirred with the oars of boats and kicking swans. Each fisherman had his little audience.

The sergeant said: "This is a crazy country. Look at that, there hasn't been a fish caught there all day, and they believe it happened. Maybe they're not after fish. It's a crazy country, and it's getting me nuts, too." He spat out a little chewed water and then he went on. "I've got something bothering me," he said. "It's a ghost story. I don't believe in it, but I know it happened. Only I don't believe in ghosts. I've been thinking about it, sniffing around it, and I can't make any sense out of it."

"You see," he said, "I'm at a little station up in the country. Not a very big one. There is a village about a mile from camp, and in the evening we walk in and get a couple of glasses of beer and try to figure out this darts game."

Catch Excites Crowd

Far up the line of fishermen a man caught a fish about the size of a sardine and caused so much excitement that he was surrounded by people in a moment. The sergeant chuckled. "I used to work salmon in the Columbia River," he said, and let it go at that. "Well, anyway," he said, "it came on toward dark. I've got some paper work to do, so I figured I'd walk back to camp. The other fellows weren't ready to go yet. They're kidding the armadillo, telling her they know movie stars. So I started out alone."

"I've been over that little road at least a hundred times. I knew every foot of it, I guess. It's a narrow, little road, with hedges on both sides so you can't see into the fields. The road is kind of cut down, like a trench. It's not a very dark night, at least there is some starlight, and I can see some clouds, like it was going to rain." He stopped and seemed to be considering whether he should go on at all. He was looking across the Serpentine at the little pavilion where they rent boats, where the line of people wait all day for their turn to rent a boat.

The sergeant made up his mind suddenly. "About half past there was a light out on the road. There was a little cottage, kind of, with the hedge coming up to it on both sides. There is a garden in front, a fence and then this big square window with little panes. The light was coming out of that window. I looked through and could see the room. It was kind of pleasant. There was a lamp on the table, and a fire in a small fireplace. It wasn't a very bright light, but you could see pretty well. There's a white cat asleep on the seat of a chair, and sitting beside the table under the lamp is a woman about fifty. I should say, she is sewing on something. I stood there. Perhaps for a couple of minutes. It was peaceful and cozy looking and nice."

No Blackout Curtains

"In a minute I walked on. There was something bothering me in the back of my mind. And then I thought 'Sure that's what it is, no blackout curtains.' I hadn't seen a light coming out of a window at night for ten months—that's how long I've been over. I was going to go back and tell that woman to pull her blackout curtains in case some country cop came along. She'd get a stiff fine. I turned around and looked back. I couldn't see the cottage, but I could see the light shining out in the road. 'Well then,' I thought, 'What the hell, maybe no cop will come by.' It looked so nice, the room and the fire that you could look in on. You get awfully tired of the blackout."

The sergeant picked up a little twig, dug at a grass root with it. "I walked along, but there was something that kept tickling away in my head, something I couldn't get hold of. It began to sprinkle a little bit of rain, but not enough to hurt anything. I thought about the room when it plumped into my mind. Now, this is what it is. And I've been thinking about it, and I can't figure it out. There isn't any cottage there, but there are four stone walls all black with fire. Early in the blitz some Jerry dropped a fire bomb on that cottage."

His fingers were restless. They were trying to plant the grass roots again in the hole they had come out of. "You see what worries me about the whole thing is this," he said. "I just don't believe stuff like that."

IRONING BOARD HAS DRAWSTRING COVER

When you whip yourself up an ironing board cover, instead of tacking it in place, hem the edge all the way around and run a drawstring through it. Then the cover will last longer, as it can be removed easily for regular laundering in rich suds. In addition, this type of cover pulls taut evenly, and less material is required in the making, as the two sides need not overlap.

A small amount of lemon juice, orange juice and grated lemon and orange rind will add flavor to stewed fresh or dried fruits. Use about 1 tablespoon of juice and 1 1/2 teaspoon of rind for each two cups of fruit.

A British Advance Blood Bank on the Middle East Front carries a supply of Canadian Red Cross serum. The Society maintains 40 clinics across Canada and the objective for donors this year is 12,000 weekly. In July 100 blood donations weekly are expected from Charlottetown.

Blood Donors Clinic

The new headquarters for the Canadian Red Cross Blood Donors Clinic is rapidly nearing completion and it is expected that the building will be occupied and the work of securing this much needed war service under way in a week or two days.

The building, which is on Queen Street opposite City Hall, has been made over completely with offices, restrooms and eventually all the necessary equipment required for this exacting work will be duly installed.

Certain equipment not available as a routine matter, will be secured through the generosity of citizens who will be kindly disposed towards the movement as such, and who are not available for Blood Donations. As the situation develops, more publicity as to these requirements will be available and no doubt taken advantage of to assure the success of the great war movement.

The whole matter of Blood Donors is receiving the same extreme care in the planning and carrying out of the local programme, as has been experienced in Red Cross activities on previous occasions in this Province. Dr. W. J. P. MacMillan has the vigorous support and active co-operation of many well known citizens in this movement which will reach full momentum early in August "according to plan."

Technicians taking samples for serological tests before blood donations are forwarded to the central laboratory for processing.
