Chapter 86.

Pan, however, now faced a problem. To this time, she had gone with Gloria and Gloria's friends, or else she had been with Frankie, who was very companionable. In New York, there had been dozens of friends, in London, a very few though enough acquaintances to keep Gloria as busy as she could be. Now Gloria was gone, it was not likely that any of these people would bother with her!

So she thought, half miserably as she sat alone that evening in the hotel apartment, Frankie asleep in the next room, Gloria's left over possessions once more packed away in their trunks.

At home, too, there had been George, who often came simply to see her, who often took her to theatres and concerts. George was in France, there was no knowing when he would come back.

Last winter she had often gone to so many parties with Gloria that she was glad of an evening at home alone! This evening she sat and thought about a great many things, a book neglected on her lap.

Gloria was gone, Gloria was married. In her early thirties, she was beginning life all over again, this time knowing it would be happy. For ten years she had faced nothing but misery, disillusion, finally even poverty and the complete destruction of everything she had cared for, barred from the love or even the companionship of Santley, keeping away from him so as not to interfere with his own life—and all because of a youthful mistake and the selfishness of a man now dead. All this she had faced with a smile that was sometimes impish, sometimes really amused, sometimes only the grim setting of her lips.

And she had won through every thing, she had done things seriously where she had suffered disillusion, ceased to expect more from people than she was sure of getting, took what she found with a great deal of humor. Mostly because of her extraordinary personality, she had even gone into business and made enough to be independent. And with all this she found time to be a charming mother to her son, even though she had to entrust his physical care to someone else.

"After all, I've nothing to feel badly about," Pan thought as she started to bed. "I'll read all evening of money. Suppose I were left alone and penniless?"

Next day she arranged for a lease on an apartment, they did not need the extra bed, now. The moving, Frankie's walk, a lift to the sight seeing to some of their favorite places, took them to the boy's bedtime. She spent another evening alone.

She spent this evening alone and began to feel sorry for herself. Then she had a note from George, "I'm doing a portrait, I must finish," he wrote. "Otherwise, my business is over and I'll be back in London, as soon as I can make it. But it's still a bit indefinite. I hope you are having a good time, don't stay in, women go all over London alone at night as they do at home. On the whole, it's good practice for you to be alone, it will make yourself reliant, you've depended so on Gloria. However, you don't need this counsel any more. It's been a long day since you felt no one wanted to be with you. I hope it's a day that will never return."

He wrote again about Gloria— "I'm so glad about it. I was puzzled over Santley's absence, stupidly never thought he might have gone to her in New York. I have an ideal pair, her vivacity balanced by her steadiness, his extreme quiet by her animation and they're both as true and sincere and fine as any people I expect to meet in this life."

"It's quite true, I have depended upon her too much," Pan said to herself after she had read this letter several times. "This is my chance to be independent. I've everything in my favor, I have no worries over a home or money. I'm in a city where I'm not known. It was Norris City, I could only see people who didn't like me, for whom I shouldn't care. This is a beginning for me."

But it was easier to say than to put into practice. Invitations to Gloria she had answered by saying that Gloria had left town for a time in a day or so letters ceased to come. If she wanted to be alone, she had a splendid opportunity! Then she realized that she was discouraging other people from looking her up. But where to make a beginning of all these new friendships?

Not that stunning golden haired woman with the old little husband who twisted his mustache all the time! She would be polite and bored.

Not that gorgeous blackhaired blue-eyes woman with a skin like rich cream, who danced now and then on the stage and wore black velvet and satin and pearls. Pan could never think of a thing to say to her.

Not the little chatterbox with the pink cheeks, who rattled along telling gossip about everyone mentioned, politicians, actors, actresses, writers, artists, and mere private friends. Pan hated gossip, never talked it and was too earnest minded to care about listening to it.

Not—but there was that nice old English lady who had taken a fancy to her.

"We'll go call on Mrs. Clarke," she told Frankie when they started for a walk. Frankie gave her courage.

But her heart was beating at what seemed twice its normal speed when she rang the bell and sent in her name.
