AIR-DRYING OF WHITE PINE

A careful study of the drying rate of white pine conducted by the Forest Products Laboratories, Department of the Interior, disclosed the fact that a normal pile of one-inch lumber will dry from green to air dry condition in about six weeks under summer conditions such as existed in the summer of 1930. Lumber in the top zones of the pile dries much more quickly than in the bottom zones, the lag in the latter case being sometimes as much as four weeks behind the top. The side zones dry more quickly than the middle zone.

HEAVY MOTOR TRAFFIC—There is a very heavy motor traffic now being handled between Cape Tormentine and Prince Edward Island, especially for the past few days. About forty flat cars, each holding about three motor cars, are carried on each trip of the boat both ways. The Sunday train and boat service to the Island, which was inaugurated for the first time last month, has proved to be very popular. Not only is the ferry crowded with motor travellers, but the through sleeping car train connection between Moncton and Charlottetown has proved to be a very popular feature, and the travelling public is showing its appreciation of the new service by patronizing it liberally.—Moncton Transcript.

Children Fail In Search For Work

MONTREAL, July 13.—Hundreds of Montreal boys and girls graduating from High School a short time ago are ready to earn their own living but can find nothing to do. The Family Welfare Association, which supports several hundred families where the father is either unemployed, disabled or dead has had the problem of what is to be done with these young people, brought vividly before it recently.

"It has always been our proud boast that the boys and girls who had been placed as a general rule before they left the institution," G. B. Clarke, general secretary of the Family Welfare Association, stated lately. "This year this group of children do not appear to find a job any easier of attainment than do those who have finished elementary school," he added.

To understand the seriousness of the situation, the case of a girl of 14, might be cited as typical of many which confront social service workers at this time. The girl in question is tall, thin and overgrown in fact. Her father has been out of work for almost a year. Her mother, who has borne many children, goes out to work by the day, whenever she can get it to do. The Family Welfare suggested that the girl who had finished school take a place as nurse-maid. She was sent to a country home and given full charge of a baby. She had the baby's washing to do, rather a stiff task to set a youngster. The mother of the infant played golf all day and if the child cried at night the little nurse-maid was expected to get up and attend to his wants. The 14-year-old became discouraged, as a much older person might do under similar circumstances, and returned home. "I don't want to take care of babies for a living, my mother has always had them and I have always had to look after them. Please find me something else to do," the child pleaded with the Family Welfare representative. The next place of employment was a restaurant, where the little girl carried heavy trays for the waitresses and received $16 a month and her food. There were branches in other parts of the city, and she was often sent to them at rush hours. The child seldom spent less than 50 cents a day for carfare. Frequently it was midnight when she reached home. Her father naturally objected to such hours for a child. Then the manager of the restaurant told the girl that she was not strong enough for the work, and now she is at home again, and her home is not a happy place. The condition of affairs described would seem to point to two great needs in the community. First of all that something should be done to train little girls who have to work, for the kind of work that people will be willing to give them, the association claims. The second great need is the continued support of social agencies which devote themselves to character building—such as the settlement houses and the parks and playgrounds. Children cannot be left to their own devices if they are later to develop into solid law-abiding citizens, it was argued.
