which a mill hand named William Bouchard met his death. Bouchard, who was at work on a circular saw, wore a heavy overcoat, and by the coat catching in the carriage which conveys the logs to the revolving saw, he was drawn towards certain death, without any means of escaping, for he could not extricate himself. The saw cut through his left shoulder and severed his head and right arm from his body.

FINISH OF FOX TRIAL

(Continued from page seven) When they were going home they got no parcel at the station and did not take any foxes back with them.

The next witness was Mrs. George Bearsto, wife of the hotel keeper at Alberton. She had heard that Birch's foxes were stolen out knew nothing whatever to connect the prisoner with the theft.

George Bearsto from Alberton was the next witness. He knew the prisoner and had seen him on the station premises on the morning of January third between six thirty and eight o'clock. Hayes was at the hotel the night of January second. He was talking to a man from Kensington who was interested in foxes in Alberton.

Charles R. Burke was the next witness. He said that he knew Hayes, the prisoner. He had had some conversation with the prisoner since Bennett and Birch lost their foxes. He told the prisoner to look out or he would be caught.
