SMILES

THEY OFTEN DO

"That fellow sure pulled a bone today." "Why, how was that?" "Why that's Dr. Browne! He set little Willie Jones' broken leg this morning."

EASILY SUBMERGED

"As a drinker Tom's a regular submariner." "What do you mean?" "Oh, he goes under easily you know."

Me: Yes, I'm just fresh from the country. She: That's old stuff. That's what they tell us about the eggs and things we get here.

AS THEY CAST OFF

Old Sailor: Ever been on water before? Recruit: Sure—stopped drinking a half dozen times in my life.

MOUTH OMITTED

He (sentimentally): Answer me with your eyes. She: You will always be answered with my nose.

The Red Lamp

I am now convinced that any attempt to solve these crimes by the discovery of an underlying motive is a mistake. Nor will Greenough's study of psychology help him here, unless he is expert in its psychopathic developments.

One cannot piece together into a rational whole the fragmentary impulses of a lunatic. An incendiary fire was started beneath the boat-house last night, or rather toward morning. An assemblage of what was apparently oil-soaked waste was placed in one of the pails from the stooop, and a candle lighted and placed in it. Over this was laid such lumber as was left from the repair of the pier.

Had Halliday been asleep the entire building might have burned. As it happened, he had been in the woods near where we found the boat on a chance that its proprietor might pay it a visit. He discovered the fire from some distance and by hard running, reached it in time to extinguish it.

He notified Greenough early this morning, but that gentleman was extremely noncommittal. He stood with his hands in his pockets, kicking over the ashes of the fire.

"I don't get that," said Halliday, beligerently. "Don't you?" said Greenough, and after kicking the ashes once more, took an unfringed departure.

The best we can make of that is that the detective believes the whole thing a clumsy but concerted plan, on Halliday's part and mine; that we have endeavored to show that, although his watchers would be able to testify that I had not left the house last night, the unknown is still working.

Nor can I entirely blame him for that. Whoever built the fire knew that Halliday was out at the time. But Halliday could not so state without betraying his knowledge of the boat, a matter he wishes to keep to himself as long as possible.

Small wonder that the detective, estimating from its charred remains the amount of lumber heaped over the flame, was skeptical. "You are a good sleeper, Mr. Halliday!"

A new month begins today, and like Pepsy, it behooves me to stock of myself. In spite of my best endeavors, some of my anxiety has crept into this record during the last month, and not always sanely for myself.

Edith will not go and leave Halliday; Jane will not consider abandoning me here, although she has no idea of the true situation. "If you want to go back to town," she says, "I'll go too, of course. But if you are talking about staying here alone, for some silly reason, I won't even consider it. You wouldn't have a clean shirt, after the first week."

But, even if I felt that no action would be precipitated by the police in case of such a move, I have a responsibility I cannot evade. The responsibility to my tenant.

I have, by a reduced rent and an alluring advertisement, brought here an elderly paralytic and his young secretary. And, evade the issue as I may, the fact remains that the last two acts of violence have been on my property. From the beginning, indeed, the most casual survey of the situation shows me that Twin Hollows has been a sort of focal point. It was on this property that I saw the sheep-killer hunt sanitarium, not on it, but adjacent to it, is still hidden the boat, and it was from my own float that he first escaped from Carroway and later killed his flashlight and my watch. The night of his arrival, Halliday saw the boat-house occupied, he worked his way through the salt marsh toward the sea.
