Dempsey's Car Seized by Sheriff

NEW YORK, July 5.—A valuable limousine owned by Jack Dempsey was seized today by a deputy sheriff, acting on a writ issued last Friday in Batavia, N. Y., in a $100,000 suit brought by Frank Spellman, in connection with a motion picture enterprise. The car was taken while Dempsey was inside a hotel. The writ called for the seizure of all the boxes' available property.

NEW YORK, July 5.—Jack Dempsey, world's heavyweight champion, quietly left his hotel here late today and a short time later was aboard a train bound for Salt Lake City, Utah. He was accompanied by Teddy Hayes his trainer, and Detective Sergeant Mike Trant, Chicago, who has been the champion's bodyguard and constant companion since he began training for the bout with Georges Carpentier at Jersey City last Saturday. The titleholder will visit his mother, Mrs. Cella Dempsey, to whom he addressed a telegram announcing his victory shortly after he stepped from the ring. After the visit he probably will go to California.

IN MEMORIAM

In loving memory of my dear mother, Mrs. Robert Thompson, who died at Heatherdale, July 7, 1919.

The my mother has departed. Still I feel her spirit near. As she pleads before the Heavenly Father's throne, And her prayers my life shall answer. For I long to meet her there, And to see the Christ who bought me for His own. (inserted by her daughter.)

THE OUTLAW The Story of a Girl Who Didn't Want to Marry By ETHEL LLOYD PATT. Chapter XXXI

Of course, that night I couldn't keep the good news to myself any longer.

"Well, I told mother that the Champion Film Company was going to give me $30 a week for eight weeks.

"Oh, Nellie, child!" she said, "it seems too good to be true! But you mustn't give it all to us."

"Well, I agreed, 'I'd like a few nice clothes myself, mother.' But most of it I want to go to you. Tom is working now—Tom was my oldest brother—so he is able to take care of himself. But Fred and Clara I'd like to keep at school. It's so hard, mother, for people who aren't educated to earn a livelihood these days. I'm beginning to realize that. This is just good luck for me. It might never happen again. But there's one thing about it. If it lasts, that I want to do for you, mother. I want to get somebody to work for us, so that you won't have the care of little Jane. She's getting too big and strong for you mother. She tires you out."

"Well," admitted mother, "if you're going to earn as much as that, it would be awfully nice to have a wash woman once a week."

"No," I declared, "I don't mean a woman once a week. I mean some body every day. Listen, mother, I want you to go down in the village tomorrow and look up somebody. You need that more than you do clothes. Now promise me you'll do it."

"It seems so lazy," said mother, weakly.

"Dear," I said, and put my arms around her close, "don't you ever say that silly word again."

And that was how one of my greatest ambitions—to make life easier for mother—was first gratified.

My mother made the arrangement to have the girl come in the morning at about half-past 8 and leave after she had prepared the dinner—not waiting to serve it.

"This mother and I planned together so that father need not know that we had the help in the house."

We both believed—with cause, that should father hear of the excellent salary I was earning and my consequent ability to be of real financial assistance, he might not bring home any of his wages at all. As it was he spent more than a third of all he could earn in drink.

Thus for about ten days things moved smoothly with us. I was made happier by the faint color that had come into mother's cheeks and the less weary look in her eyes. But, as luck would have it, the calm on our home sea wasn't to continue.

One night father was drinking heavily and the next day—unexpectedly at about half-past 11 in the afternoon he returned to the house because he was too ill to work.

As it happened I also had been at home since the middle of the day because of a storm which had made it impossible for us to make certain films. And so I was the first to bear the brunt of father's wrath.

"I came clumping into the kitchen and the first we knew, we heard his voice demanding of the woman, why she was 'doing his wife's work?'"

"I wanted to save mother the scene if I felt was impending, if I could. At the sound of father's voice, I ran lightly downstairs and into the kitchen."

"Don't bother with the house, father," I said, "this is just a woman who comes in by the day to help mother sometimes. Go on up stairs, if you don't feel well, and get to bed, won't you?"

"A woman to help your mother! I growled my father. 'And since when does she need help? Where's all this money coming from? I'd like to know? How much do you get a day?' he demanded of the woman, who stood with bent head over the kitchen stove."

"A dollar and a half a day," she murmured, before I could stop her. "I don't know how much more she gets. Spend-thrifts, fathers—no wonder we can't get anything ahead!"

ALTHOUGH WATER DOES NOT MIX noticeably with oil, while at rest, when the two liquids are violently beaten together, as in an engine, an emulsion is formed, and this is a very inferior lubricant. The best oils emulsify less than poor ones, but even those of excellent quality develop a thick, curdled material, which is likely to obstruct fine oil passages and is of little lubricating value. Water thus deteriorates the oil. Most of the water present sinks to the lowest point of the system, where the pump intake is usually placed, and thus instead of oil, tends to be circulated, especially when the engine is first started. It is, however, fortunate that it does settle thus, because it escapes at once when the drain plug is removed, thus revealing its presence. If a sample is drawn into a glass jar occasionally, water if present, can be readily detected. Any large amount of water present with the oil, may cause rusting and sticking of the pistons if the engine is left idle for a long time and therefore the oil should be water-free when a car is set up. In cold weather, if there is water in the pump, it may freeze and burst it or cause its breakage when the engine starts and if it is present in any of the oil pipes, they may be split, or become so obstructed that the bearings fed by them burn out before the ice has melted and oil flow is resumed.

FUEL CONSUMPTION IS DOUBLED

It is, but it seems likely that your carburetor is feeding too much gas.

A. P. writes: After my car has gone over a severe bump, I often notice a strong smell of raw gasoline, that seems to come from under the hood. Is there a leak somewhere, especially when you suppose it is? There is no smell of gas when the car is standing.

Answer: Presumably whatever spillage of gasoline occurs, under the hood, must be through the air vent of the vacuum tank and we suggest that you have some one ride on the running board and watch this tank, while you drive over a rough road. If the fuel level in the upper vacuum tank chamber runs altogether too high, there may be gasoline escape through the vent, from surging in the tank of uneven roads, especially if the car is descending a steep grade. Unless the main tank air vent is open there may be loss through the vacuum tank air relief. Should you find the vacuum tank is the point of fuel loss, you better have it inspected at the service station of this make of vacuum system. When there is a "pop back" in the intake, some liquid gasoline, lodged in the manifold, is often blown out into the hood space.

My car is giving 20 m. p. g. of gasoline until I had the bearings taken up and the valves ground, but since then I am getting only 10 m. p. g. Probably the cause of this and what the remedy is, you are running on too rich a mixture, owing to the carburetor dash-adjustment having in some way become altered so that when you are operating with it in the "lean" position, you are really running with it too rich. You should make sure that the carburetor actually secure a lean mixture. You also better hand-crank the engine and be sure that there is no serious compression leak in any of the cylinders. If there is, for any reason, the compression will be high. Was the valve timing changed when the work was done? If so it may be less correct, in-correctly, you will probably obtain better mileage when the bearings work

The Duchess of Marlborough is the daughter of the late William K. Vanderbilt and the present Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont. Her marriage to the Duke of Marlborough took place in 1895. They have two children, the Marquis of Blandford, heir to his father's title and Lord Ivor Churchill. The engagement of the Duke and Duchess became known in 1907, when they decided to live apart for two years. Temporary reconciliations were effected largely through the intercession of the King in 1919 and the Duke and Duchess took up their residence again at Crowhurst until February, 1920, when they separated for the last time.

The following March the Duchess started suit to establish conjugal rights and in May she obtained a final divorce.
