Old Post Office In

Building Unmarked Though Memorial Of Old Capital Of Upper Canada

By G. H. Williamson
Written Especially for The Canadian Press.
KINGSTON, Ont., Nov. 25 (By The Canadian Press)—There still stands on Princess street, Kingston, the old stone building that was used about the year 1800 as a post-office. It is below King street, and on the Kings Highway No. 2 and now the quarters of a second-hand store. Immediately opposite is the old Commercial Bank building, which was the first home of Queen's Medical College, then the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Upper Canada. It was in this portion of Kingston, close to the old French Fort Frontenac, that British and French fought their last battle for possession of that fortress established in the year 1673 by Count Frontenac and Chevalier de la Salle.
Strange to say, Kingston has no tablet on its early day postoffice, which might draw the attention of the tourist travelling from Toronto or Montreal to the old Capital of Upper Canada (1792) and of the United Province of Canada (1841-1844).
It was in the year 1789 that a postoffice was opened in Kingston, and in the same year small offices were also opened in York (now Toronto), Niagara and Elizabethtown (now Brockville). Except for a single annual trip from Montreal to Niagara there was no postal service west of Kingston. At that time a courier set out from Montreal in January, travelling either on foot or on snowshoes. If he made 18 miles a day he was considered lucky. In subsequent years the mail service began to grow in volume and it was as

Of War Days

LONDON, Nov. 24—An account of a fist fight between Sir Sam Hughes, Canadian Minister of Defence and General Beyers, South African Minister of Defence and witnessed by King George, Marshal Foch and other notables, is contained in a book of reminiscences by Major General J. E. B. Seely, published today by Hodder Stoughton.
The author commanded the Canadian Cavalry Brigade during a considerable portion of the war. Two years before war broke out, he was Minister for War in the British Government and when the army manoeuvres were held in the eastern counties, he was in attendance upon the King. Several unfortunate incidents occurred that day. Seely's own charger went lame so the remount department supplied him with a strange horse.
The book continues: "I told His Majesty it was arranged he should first see the representatives of the foreign powers, India and the Dominions, who would be assembled about three miles away. We cantered away for about a mile or two when the King reined up and asked me who were the representatives of the Dominions he was about to meet. While I was explaining to His Majesty that among those in the group of visitors, we could see near a clump of trees, was a representative of South Africa, I heard an angry cry. Looking around I saw my mount had bent its head and caught His Majesty securely by the foot. The King said: "I wish you would stop your horse from eating my foot," and I jabbed the animal in the mouth and he let go.

Sir Sam Landed Heavy Blow

"I asked permission to gallop forward to tell the officers the King was coming. His Majesty was naturally delighted to agree to my going, following at a slow canter. Imagine my consternation as I approached the group to see two men, both in khaki uniforms, actually engaged in a fierce boxing match. Some of the others stood apart while one or two were trying to separate the combatants. I galloped into the midst of them, told them to be ready at once to receive the King. Nevertheless, General Sam Hughes—for he was one of the combatants—with a shout of "traitor" managed to land a tremendous blow on the ear of his antagonist, General Beyers, representing South Africa.

"I rode my horse between the two men while Beyers shouted, "let me at him." I was only just in time to quell the disturbance before the King arrived. Of course he had seen the whole thing and after all the officers had been presented to him, he directed me to find out the cause of the trouble. It appeared Beyers had said to Hughes that one South African was equal to ten Britons when it came to a fight and that Hughes had replied that one Canadian was equal to twenty South Africans and that if Beyers liked to repeat his allegation, they would soon see who was the better man. That was how the fight began."

Both men, adds Seely, were Ministers of Defence in their respective countries and retained their positions until the declaration of war. Sir Sam Hughes organized the Canadian Expeditionary Force with which the author of the book served the greater part of the war. Beyers led the rebellion in South Africa against the government at the Great War. It was he who seduced Delarey from allegiance. Both swiftly crushed the rebellion; Delarey was shot accidentally and Beyers downed in the Vaal.

The Tubes in this Radio are Guaranteed!
ROGERS
Guaranteed
Tubes at
NO EXTRA COST

Quite as involved as the manufacture of radio itself is radio tube development and production. Laboratories, constant research, electrical theories, gases, chemicals! Voltages, heat resistances, filaments, hundreds of tiny parts! All concentrated into making a small glass bulb with bits of wire and metal inside. The miracle of a radio tube!

THE Rogers A/C Tube is Canada's proudest radio achievement! It made possible the first successful batteryless radio in the world—the "Rogers." It revolutionized the entire radio industry!

Rogers tubes are notable for performance and long-life. Some of the first Rogers tubes produced are still in use, after more than six years. Still giving satisfactory service! Hundreds of letters from Rogers owners prove what we say.

Every Rogers Radio is completely equipped with these famous tubes at no extra cost. Every tube is guaranteed. And the chassis itself in every Rogers radio is guaranteed for one year from the time you buy it. Your satisfaction is virtually guaranteed in advance when you choose this fine Canadian Radio.

the personality of the man who at 73 is the personification of energy. Yet in contrast to a deep-seated modesty, admits having had the privilege of showing Queen Victoria her first moving picture.
In 1897, he unwound at Balmoral Castle before the astounded eyes of Her Majesty the Queen, the first motion picture she had ever seen.
"It was her own diamond jubilee," he recalled. "And it took less than 40 seconds. In those days 40 feet were all we could take at one time. It only showed the carriage being driven down the street, but what an event it was."
And many a time he took his equipment to Sandringham to amuse Queen Alexandra, who, "poor old lady, couldn't hear so depended upon dumb shows for amusement."
In the early days etiquette demanded that no one should sit in front of royalty created difficulties.
"The King and Queen and members of the royal family sat in the front row, the army and navy officers next, and then the servants and others," Captain Barker explained. "And you know what that would mean—the royal family had the worst seat in the house. But we finally got around that difficulty—we put the royal family at a good distance back and then made everyone else sit along the sides."

But no longer does such etiquette hold. Now the King and Queen or any other members of royalty attends any theatre when and how he or she wishes and seldom does the audience know they have been to the show unless they might see it in the paper next day, this informant said. "Someone may phone the theatre and ask that a few seats be reserved for the Queen and a small party and they come and no one knows the difference except the manager, and often they come without telling anyone."
"Lots of times we have been able, if it's a private matinee, to show the King and Queen pictures before they leave of their own arrival at the show. We rush down the film to Oxford Street and have it developed in an hour and a half."

QUALITY BRINGS PREMIUM

Any farmer in the least degree skeptical of the real value of quality in his produce attracting real interest on the part of the consumer, needs only to visit a city like Montreal, stroll along St. Catherine St., particularly in the dusk of early evening, and watch the eager crowds admire striking window displays of poultry, meat, butter, eggs, fruits, vegetables and canned goods, all graded and displayed to show excellence of quality as marked by government grades. This is the season when poultry holds the centre of attraction, and no farmer or poultryman could fail to get enthusiastic were he to see the evident quality and finish of "A" grade poultry (and the price tags on them) or to see the number of really fine birds which pass over the counter in the better stores of the busy shopping districts. Quality not only brings a premium but also develops demand. Feed your stock to a finish and cash in on quality—Federal Department of Agriculture.

Murphy: "What's that in your pocket?"
Pat (in whisper): "Dynamite. I'm waiting for Casey. Every time he meets me he slaps me on the chest and breaks me pipe. Next time he does it he'll blow his hand off."
